Let us see what the situation is. Last fall cotton was selling at about 38 cents a pound, and this notwithstanding it was being denied access to the markets of the world. Then the War Trade Board began to discuss stabilization of the market. They began to give out statements to the effect that they were going to investigate conditions with a view of fixing a price. Of course, any man with the least practical business sense knew the effect such agitation would have, though it is well known the War Trade Board had no authority whatever to fix a price on cotton. But they succeeded in hammering down the price about $40 a bale, and when that was accomplished the agitation terminated, and the board admitted they had no authority in law to fix a price.

The last crop is shown to be only a little over 11,000,000 bales. In normal times the United States consumes half the crop. We have consumed in this country already over 3,000,000 bales of last year's crop. There are less than 6,000,000 bales available now to meet the world's demand. The demands of foreign countries are approximately 8,000,000 bales. Why is it then that cotton at the present time is selling at a price below what it costs to produce it?

We hear a great deal about the cotton exchanges and their unfair methods. I have no doubt whatever that they are operated in a way to beat down the price. There can be no other explanation of the system by which they are able to hold down the future market $25 a bale below the spot market. I am in favor of legislation to correct the evils of the exchanges. The system by which they offer a purchaser unmarketable and unspinable cotton ought to be penalized and this and other abuses corrected or the exchanges should be abolished. But we should face the facts as they are and not attempt to evade or cover the situation by abuse of the exchanges. The trouble with the cotton market is that countries that need cotton and want to buy it are not allowed to have it. The War Trade Board has adopted a system that limits exports so that every nation is rationed a certain proportion of what is required, and Germany and Austria are not allowed to purchase at all, though they need at least 3,000,000 bales. If the War Trade Board would hands off and allow cotton to go to the markets of the world unhampered and unrestrained there would be a rush for it that would send the market soaring. The same thing is true of cotton seed and peanuts. The Government while guaranteeing a price on other things reduced the price of cotton seed from $83 to $69 a ton—at the same time forcing the farmer to sell his cotton seed or run the risk of prosecution for hoarding.

Yet, while reducing the price of cotton seed $14 per ton, the price of meal, which must be had for fertilizer, was increased $7 per ton. Linters which the Government was taking was suddenly reduced 3 cents a pound, making a loss of several millions of dollars. In the meantime the export of cottonseed and peanut oils was restricted under the rationing system, which determined the amount that might go to any country and by which none may go to Germany or Austria. Of course, we were all willing while the war was in progress to make any sacrifice to sustain our armies at the front and to protect the honor of the Nation. The South gave her sons to die in France, and they did not murmur at any financial sacrifice that was considered necessary. But the legislation authorizing an embargo against American products was only intended to be used as a military necessity to hasten the surrender of our enemies, and now that the war is over, the sooner commerce is resumed throughout the world the better it will be for all concerned, the quicker we may hope to recoup our losses, and the easier it will be for our enemies to make good all assessments to be levied against them to compensate the outrages they have perpetrated against humanity and civilization. It is not right to continue the restrictions upon the exportation of American goods and products to the detriment of the producers of this Nation in order that some of the nations of Europe may have advantage over others in the process of rehabilitation and readjustment.

Some time ago I took up with the War Trade Board the question of restriction of exports of cotton and cottonseed and peanut oils. In reply to my inquiry I have a letter, from which I quote:

The whole question of the extent to which the blockade of the central powers shall continue to be maintained has been the subject of serious consideration by the representatives in Paris of the United States and the allies. We are informed by them that for important political and military reasons it is regarded as highly desirable for the present to continue the blockade in its main features, and that the immediate removal of the blockade would eliminate one of the most persuasive reasons for the acceptance by Germany of the terms of peace which the associated Governments desire to impose.

I submit that the proposition to restrict the exports of American products except for the purpose of aiding our military operations is a plain violation of the intents for which this dangerous and extraordinary power was granted. To attempt to continue it after the war has been won to secure a better settlement with Germany is a great injustice to the producers of this country. It is inconceivable that our allies would be willing to punish the farmers of this country in order to collect higher indemnities from Germany.

The farmers of the South gave their sons to die side by side with the soldiers of England and France. By their heroic service and sacrifice they forced the surrender of the mighty armies of the German Empire. It is indefensible now, since the war is over, that our people should be made to suffer that our allies may collect damages of Germany. The practical effect of the policy would require the producers of this country to assist Germany in paying indemnities to be assessed against her. This is an injustice that should not be tolerated by the American Congress, and if relief is to be had it must come through the action of Congress. The War Trade Board has indicated quite clearly what may be expected of them.

We went to war in defense of the right of the citizens of this country to travel the common highways of the ocean and to ship their products to the markets of the world. Since by the sacrifice of our treasure and the lives of the youth of this land these rights have been vindicated shall we allow the War Trade Board to deny us the fruits of our victory? I do not know what that board expects to do, but for one I insist that the Congress of the American people should see to it that they do not lose the benefits of the victory so nobly won. I do not believe the farmers of the South are blind to the facts. They know the situation. They know at last that they are not dependent alone upon one crop. They know that the present supply is far below the world's demands. They know that for the next year a crop of 9,000,000 bales will sell for more than a crop of 12,000,000 bales. They know, too, the value of the crop of grain and live stock that may be raised by the labor and expense that would raise the production of cotton to the point of depressing the market. They are going to hold the cotton on hand and grow less next year. They know that sooner or later peace must be declared and that export restrictions and limitations must be removed, after which there will be a rush for cotton such as has never been known since the days following the Civil War.

But I submit that the interest of the Nation as a whole requires, and simple justice to the farmers of the South demands, that all restrictions and limitations on the export of this great American product should be removed now. It ought to be done while yet some portion of the crop remains in the hands of those by whose toil it was produced and who are entitled to share in the benefits of the higher price to follow the removal of the embargo which must come in course of time.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES H. SLOAN,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919,

On House joint resolution 154, authorizing the erection of a memorial in Washington to the memory and in honor of the various orders of sisters who gave their services as nurses on battle fields, in hospitals, and on floating hospitals during the Civil War.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, no appropriation is asked from the United States Treasury; only enough public ground here in the National Capital for the erection of a memorial to the devoted sisters who in the time of fratricidal strife in America saw no foeman, but only unfortunate brothers who in the tide of war had fallen sick, wounded, or dying, lent them comfort, eased their pain, or removed the death damp from brows far from wife, mother, and home.

While they were near no wearer of the blue or gray must pass without the ministering comfort which only tender woman's hand can give. Were they able to be present, of no American soldier need it be said, as was written of the legionaire:

A soldier of the legion lay dying in Algiers;
There was lack of woman's nursing; there was dearth of woman's tears.

Strong men are buoyed up in battle by the inspiration of the charge and the shock of conflict, but then after cannon roar had ceased and the roll of musketry had lulled, when the smoke had cleared away, and the horrible revelation appeared of the battle between God's images, 'mid shriek of pain, prayer for succor, and dying groans, these gentle spirits, moving like animated benedictions among the fallen, ministering as only devoted women could to the weak, the suffering, and the dying.

Their work was not so systematically organized then as womanhood has wrought in the great conflict recently closed far overseas, but the miracles of mercy wrought by them in the Southland will never, and should never, be forgotten by the sons and daughters of those two great armies, whose members met as brothers on the war field, where the reddest sword must win.

Abraham Lincoln said of these sisters:

More lovely than anything I have ever seen in art, so long devoted to the illustrations of love, mercy, and charity, are the pictures that remain of those modest sisters going on their errands of mercy among the suffering and the dying. Gentle and womanly, yet with the courage of soldiers leading a forlorn hope to sustain them in contact with such horrors. As they went from cot to cot, distributing the medicines prescribed, or administering the cooling and strengthening drafts as directed, they were the angels of mercy.

The work of women during the present war, including the work of those who succeeded in the several orders of those whose work we would memorialize, should impress every Congressman and Senator with the propriety of the request involved in this resolution and remove all obstacles or objections, by vote or voice.

During the Mexican War the mercies of women on the battle field for the suffering, although the fallen had been battling for the lifeblood of father, husband, and friend, were sublimely shown. The simple Mexican women ministered to the florid northern foeman as they did to the suffering friend of more sable hue.

One of America's most beloved poets, writing of this, termed these women the "angels of Buena Vista."

But the noble Mexican women
Still their holy tasks pursued
Through that long, dark night of sorrow,
Worn and faint and lacking food,
Over weak and suffering brothers,
With a tender care they hung;
And the dying foeman blessed them
In a strange and northern tongue.

Not wholly lost, O Father,
Is this evil world of ours;
Upward through its blood and ashes
Springs afresh the Eden flowers;
From its smoking hell of battle
Love and pity send their prayer;
And still Thy white-winged angels
Hover dimly in our air.

The Late Senator Stone, of Missouri.

MEMORIAL ADDRESS
OF
HON. WILLIAM L. IGOE, OF MISSOURI,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Sunday, February 2, 1919.

The House had under consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE, late a Senator of the United States from the State of Missouri, and the Hon. JACOB E. MEEKER, late a Member of this House from the State of Missouri.

"Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of their distinguished public careers, the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

"Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

"Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the families of the deceased."

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, my personal and intimate relationship with Senator STONE began only with my election to Congress. When I took my seat here in March, 1913, I had known him only in a general way and by reputation, as everyone in Missouri had known him up until that time.

I think the outstanding things in his character were his courage and his honesty. He rendered great service as a Member of this House, as governor of the State of Missouri, as Senator, and also in private life.

Members have spoken of his courage, and there is one thing I recall as a boy that he did in Missouri that required as much courage as was ever displayed by a public man at any time, and that was when, in the State of Missouri, some people undertook to set up a sort of religious persecution. It took courage for a man in public life to denounce it, but Senator STONE had no hesitation whatever in going from one end of the State to the other denouncing the movement as un-American, unfair, and a disgrace to the State.

There is no man, in my judgment, in the Democratic Party who is entitled to more credit for the success of the legislative program of the Democratic Party in Congress since 1913 than Senator STONE. He was a leader and a worker. He worked day and night as a member of committees of the Senate and he labored with the members of his party. He worked to make a record for the administration and carry out the promises that his party had made. He fought for his party; he believed in his party; and he fought for it because he thought it was an instrumentality through which the wishes of the majority of the people might best be carried out, and thus preserve the Government which we all love.

There are very few people, outside of Members of Congress, who served with him who know how devoted Senator STONE was to the duties of his office. He did not spare himself, and though at times in recent years his health was impaired, he did not slacken his efforts, but devoted his entire time to legislative matters, working far into the night. No one who came to his office for advice or assistance was turned away, and all were made to feel welcome. It was marvelous how a man so busy could find time to receive so many callers and give them his aid in satisfying their wants.

I had occasion many times in the last few years of his life to go to him for advice and assistance and talked to him in confidence when these great issues came upon us. Immediately preceding the war and the declaration of war itself I had occasion to meet him and to discuss matters with him. He never undertook, in my judgment, to lead any man along any course nor did he undertake to persuade them from doing what they conceived to be right and proper, and in all the criticisms that have been visited upon him for the course that he took, it seems to me that the men who are most bitter never did understand the greatness of his character nor the greatness of his love of his country. There is no man who ever served in this Congress who had a greater love for his country than did Senator STONE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that in the time to come that he will be remembered for what he was, a great American, a great Senator, a courageous man, and one who wished to serve the people who were generous enough to select him to speak for them. Mr. Speaker, we have lost a friend and the Nation has lost an able, honest, and courageous statesman.

OF
HON. JOHN M. BAER,
OF NORTH DAKOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to place in the RECORD a concurrent resolution passed by the North Dakota Legislature indorsing the general plan of a league of nations:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Thomas Hall, secretary of state for the State of North Dakota, do hereby set forth and certify that the following is the full text and the whole thereof of a certain concurrent resolution adopted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota.

Dated at the capitol in Bismarck, N. Dak., this 3d day of March, 1919.

[SEAL.] THOMAS HALL,
Secretary of State.

Concurrent resolution favoring the establishment of a league of nations to enforce peace and aim at promoting the liberty, progress, and orderly development of the world.

Whereas the war, now brought to a victorious close by the associated power of the free nations of the world, was above all else a war to end war and protect human rights: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That we favor the establishment of a league of nations of which the United States shall be a member. We believe that such a league should aim at promoting the liberty, progress, and orderly development of the world; that it should clinch the victory won at such terrible sacrifice by having the united potential force of all its members as a standing menace against any nation that seeks to upset the peace of the world; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the President and to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from the State of North Dakota.

OF

HON. ALVAN T. FULLER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. FULLER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the authority permitting all Members to extend their remarks in the RECORD upon pending bills, I desire to make some observations concerning joint resolution No. 436, providing for the appointment by each Member of the House of Representatives of one secretary and one clerk, whose names shall be placed on the rolls and paid in monthly installments.

I know that an allowance of $2,000 for a secretary of a Member and $1,200 for a clerk is not an extravagant allowance provided a man takes care of the requirements of his constituents and the money is actually paid to a secretary and a clerk. I assume, however, that many Members will continue to hire secretaries and clerks at a less figure than the allowance and pocket the difference or utilize as heretofore the names of two relatives or one as "decoys" for the pay roll. I sincerely wish that we could reorganize the machinery and improve the methods of Congress so that it would function efficiently and economically and thus reestablish itself in the minds of the people. You will agree, I am sure, that we are facing the gravest crisis in all our history. The fight is on between constitutional government—law and order—and bolshevism. It should not be possible for newspapers and critics generally to make the perfectly true statements about Congress, which are and can be made. Every keen observer who comes to Washington can go home and prove to the home folks—and they do—that millions are being jimmied out of the Public Treasury for pork and patronage. No people, nor any class of people, ever thought in terms of revolution so long as they had confidence in their government. We, ourselves, have sown the seeds of bolshevism through our failure to be businesslike in conducting the legislative business of the Nation.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

The shameful abuse of the franking privilege by Members of Congress is reprehensible at any time, but in times like these, when the public is being exhorted to be thrifty in all matters, to economize and to deprive themselves of all but necessities, it seems particularly reprehensible that their Representatives in Congress, Members, if you please, of the greatest legislative body in the world, should waste millions of dollars in an abuse which smells to high heaven.

From time to time comments are printed in the daily papers all over the country referring to this abuse and that abuse in connection with the franking privilege. These items encourage the people, and quite justly, in believing that there is something "rotten in Denmark." It discredits Congress because it gives the impression that Representatives of the people in Washington enjoy privileges and perquisites of one kind or another that would not stand the light of day. This creates a lack of confidence and generates an impression that citizens are warranted in feeling that "each should be for himself and the devil take the hindermost," which is not the sort of an impression that should be generated by or concerning a self-respecting, high-minded body of legislators.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I propose to enumerate a few illuminating facts that, with one-tenth as damning evidence, would lead you and me to demand an investigation of any industrial enterprise in which we might be interested.

Firstly, there is franked out of the House Office Building daily from 20 to 30 tons of mail matter and about election time this quantity is increased to 30 or 40 tons. One Congressman sent out 750,000 parcels of literature and one political party at one election sent out 55,000,000 speeches. I took the liberty the other day of calling on the superintendent who has charge of the clerks who send out this mass of stuff, and he stated that at times there were from 500 to 600 clerks employed doing nothing but packing free literature into free envelopes to be sent through the mails free of expense for Congressmen. He stated that these clerks could address and send out about 1,500 each in a day. I asked the man in charge how many parcels a Congressman could have, and he said as many as he liked. "Well," I said, "not a million apiece," and he said, "Yes." And then I inquired how many envelopes, and he said as many as a Congressman wanted. I asked him how about the printing, and he said, "No charge to a Congressman." And I asked him about the franking privilege, and he said these things were all franked out, and then he said, by way of offering a defense, that, of course, no Congressman, unless he were a damned hog, would take more than a hundred thousand.

Now, the object of my protest, Mr. Speaker, is to muzzle the "damned hogs" and to hamstring others of the "high rollers," primarily in defense of the Treasury and secondly in justice to the self-respecting element in Congress who feel that being a Congressman is a matter in which they could justly take pride rather than that they should be part of a body referred to as grafters and psalm-singing hypocrites.

I find it is quite the custom when a Congressman is running for election or wishes to have his name before the public because he aspires for some other office to flood his district or State, as the case may be, with all kinds of free literature. For example, one of our Congressmen a while ago desired to have his name considered in connection with the governorship of his State, with the result that he conceived the idea of sending out a nice collection of books to the voters of his State. He sent out 640,000 parcels of books in one day, and upon inquiry at the post office I found that the postage would have been to ordinary mortals 45 cents each per parcel. It is a simple matter in arithmetic to see that 640,000 parcels at 45 cents apiece cost Uncle Sam over $300,000 for postage. Of course, the cost of the books themselves would be greatly in excess of this amount. It is easy to see, with this illustration in mind, that individual Congressmen can easily abuse their franking privilege to the extent of a million dollars a year.

I found another Member of Congress who conceived the idea of influencing public opinion against preparedness by delivering speeches in Congress abusing the President and playing the German game—I do not contend that this Member received any German gold for delivering these speeches, but I do maintain that he earned it. These speeches were printed at Government expense; they were franked out to German peace societies at Government expense; and then, in addition, franked envelopes were included so that the German peace societies could in turn send them without expense to any individuals whom they thought fit subjects to influence by such propaganda. Can you imagine a more devilish scheme of undermining the morale of the people at their own expense, compelling them to dig their own graves, so to speak? On the outside of the envelope that this congressional Member utilized for this purpose I find the following notation:

Preparedness. Let the truth be told. Public opinion must settle this question in the end, and there can be no public opinion of the question until the public knows the truth. The metropolitan newspapers and magazines, with few exceptions, have declined to state both sides of the question. The effort seems to have been to stampede the public into hasty action. Out with the truth. No great question like this can be determined without the facts.

How many American boys are lying out on Flanders field stiff and stark to-day as a result of such devilish propaganda delivered in the National House of Representatives and mailed into the homes of our citizens urging upon them the wisdom of combating a wild beast with gentle caresses and total unpreparedness?

If each Congressman abused his franking privilege once a term, as in the case of one of the instances I have cited above, it would make a total expense of $130,000,000. Now, when you realize that many Congressmen indulge in this monthly, the enormity of the abuse is at once apparent.

I have in mind a Congressman who was barely elected in a close district, whereupon he put into practice the plan of sending back a weekly letter to the voters of his district. He now has the district safely tucked away and, as a result of this gentle art of persuasion, he has been what might be called "popularly endorsed." The district is now "safe" for him. He now "runs ahead of the ticket." This district was close four years ago, but now it is "safe" by 7,000.

The Speaker of the House a short time ago in his birthday speech remarked on the fact that Congressmen now came to Washington for longer terms than they used to, and he ascribed this as a result of the primary system.

I would ascribe it in no small degree to the abuse of the franking privilege.

I have in mind a gentleman more ambitious, perhaps, than others for the intellectual development of his constituents by way of reading Government literature, who has been storing up every conceivable kind of Government literature for the past two years and who now has two rooms full. I suppose his idea is to literally flood his district at about election time. Personally I never before appreciated what the term "flood the district" meant. Apparently it means that literature printed at the expense of the people and transported at the expense of the people shall fall upon it "like the gentle rain from heaven."

Are our women, who are being exhorted to save a slice of bread a day; our children, who are asked to buy and sell thrift stamps; and our men, who are being called upon to sacrifice their lives, going to be satisfied to allow abuses like this to continue? Can we ourselves afford to allow them to continue?

You may recall that in 1908 a commission, consisting of Charles E. Hughes, A. Lawrence Lowell, and Harry A. Wheeler, reported that mail franked out by Congress weighed 4,531,080 pounds, representing 9,007,574 separate pieces. The total weight of all first-class mail for the whole country that year was 157,502,610 pounds. Considering congressional franked mail as first class, which is only fair, as it goes out sealed, one gets an astounding comparison. The mail franked out of Congress in 1908 amounted in pounds to more than one-fortieth of that of the whole mail of the United States of America. My investigation would lead me to believe that the output of congressional franked mail has more than doubled since that time.

Postmaster General Hitchcock, in his annual report for 1908, states as follows:

> The unrestricted manner in which the franking privilege is now being used by the several Federal services and by Congress has laid it open to serious abuses, a fact clearly established through investigations recently instituted by the department. While it has been impossible, without a better control of franking, to determine the exact expense to the Government of this practice, there can be no doubt that it annually reaches into the millions. It is believed that many abuses of the franking system could be prevented, and consequently a marked economy effected, by supplying through the agencies of the Postal Service, special official envelopes and stamps to be issued on requisition to the various branches of the Federal service requiring them and such records to be kept of official stamp supplies as will enable the Post Office Department to maintain a proper postage account covering the entire volume of free Government mail.

The different ways in which the frank is abused demonstrates the essential secrecy of the system and its personal and political uses condemn it in themselves. A fine of $300 is imposed for the personal use of the franking privilege, and yet Congressmen violate the law with impunity. In this connection, if you wish illustrations, they can be found in abundance. I would not attempt to enumerate all of the expensive evils which grow out of the franking privilege, such as loading down the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with political matter, free seeds, leave-to-print speeches, campaign documents, and so forth.

The suggestion made by Postmaster General Hitchcock in 1910 would seem to be a good one as a starting point. Certainly the overshadowing element of personal and party politics should be eliminated and the use of the frank restricted to public affairs. There should be the fullest publicity with reference to franking. I would require each Congressman to append a note to each speech or document sent out, stating the number being mailed and all other essential facts, and beyond question there should be some commission or committee representing the Post Office Department to see that Congressmen themselves obey both the letter and the spirit of the law.

Members of Congress in some instances have voluntarily submitted proposed mailing matter under their frank to the Post Office Department in advance, so that there could be no doubt of its coming within the legal requirements, but no Member of Congress is under any obligation to do this, and in the great majority of cases it is not done. In the absence of such voluntary submission, the department has no official means of knowing what Members of Congress are sending under their frank nor have they any means of keeping track of the quantity of franked mail sent by any Member or Members of Congress.

I have no desire to cast any aspersions upon the Members of Congress, but when so distinguished an authority as Mr. KITCHIN, the Democratic leader, in speaking on the river and harbor appropriation bill can say, "I sometimes fear that too many of our colleagues set up as the true measure of service here the amount of money which they can filch out of the Treasury into their districts and States for creeks or rivers or public buildings," it behooves us to be not too optimistic in our estimate of human nature as it relates to Uncle Sam's money. I have no objection to a man being careless and trustful with his own money, but I counsel most scrupulous accounting and safeguarding of the people's money which we are sworn to protect.

Of course, I do not need to present a bill of particulars as to why Congress has come into such disrepute. The situation can be summed up in this: We have been wasting public money upon our own political upkeep; the franking privilege has been grossly abused; our processes have been essentially secret; seniority and sectionalism have assumed menacing proportions; the organization of the House has become almost wholly a question of spoils and perquisites; pork and patronage often outweigh all other elements in shaping legislation; the committees—probably, at least, half of them—are a needless burden upon the people, maintained only because they provide chairmanships and perquisites for the little oligarchy of Members in control of them. In short, we have become a kind of political stock exchange, gambling in pork and patronage, and that at a time when there should be and must be the very maximum of efficiency and economy if we are to deal adequately with the crucial issues of reconstruction.

We ought to reorganize the machinery and improve the methods of Congress so that it will function efficiently and economically, and thus reestablish itself in the confidence of the people. There should be—

First. A reorganization of the standing committees which will eliminate all that do not serve a useful and legitimate purpose.

Second. A responsible executive budget system to replace the present pork-barrel method of handling appropriations.

Third. A restriction of the franking privilege and publicity with reference to it, to the extent of having each user of that privilege state in each case the kind of material franked, its purpose, and the weight of the shipment.

Fourth. (a) The abolition of all clerkships not essential to public business.

(b) The placing of all clerks upon a public pay roll.

Fifth. Absolutely open meetings for all committees and conference committees.

Sixth. The election by each committee of its own chairman.

Seventh. The limitation of congressional business to matters that are national in scope, thus eliminating local and private bills which now congest Congress.

I believe you will agree with me that the machinery and methods of Congress must be made open, honest, efficient, and businesslike before we can hope to accomplish the solution of our legislative problems of reconstruction and rehabilitation in a manner satisfactory to the people.

I returned a short time ago from a trip through the war zone of Europe. A few of the details of that trip I am going to take the liberty of enumerating; and I wish in this connection that every Member of this House could have made a similar trip, because I believe he would have returned with a loftier conception of public duty and a higher sense of obligation to those men who have been willing to lay down their lives so freely that liberty might not perish.

TRIP THROUGH THE WAR ZONE OF EUROPE.

I am deeply conscious of the fact that in narrating my observations made on the French, American, and British war fronts the occurrences there are on such a tremendous scale that it would be quite impossible to attempt to adequately describe them. It says in the Good Book that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing, and I realize the fact that my conclusions are not infallible. I have, however, tried to set down things as I saw them and as they were reported to me, regardless of their possible inconsistency.

When my friends heard that I was sailing for France four days after the signing of the armistice, they smiled disdainfully. "The war is over," one of them reminded me. "There is nothing doing over there." "You will only be wasting your time," said another. And when I came back they greeted me with "You didn't see much, did you?" I told them that all I had seen was some 6,000,000 men under arms, including 2,000,000 of my embattled countrymen; a thousand miles or more of trenches; a region larger than Masachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island put together which was as completely devastated as was San Francisco after the earthquake; fields littered with dead horses, shattered weapons, discarded equipment, and all the other débris of battle; hospitals filled to the doors with freshly wounded; balloons, airplanes, endless caravans of motor trucks, field guns, thousands upon thousands of them, and long-range cannon; American, French, British, Belgian, Canadian, Australian, New Zealand, South African, Indian, Algerian, and Moroccan fighting men; Foch, Castlenau, Petain, Nivelle, Gouraud, Clemenceau, Haig, Poincaré, King Albert, Lloyd George, and others whose names will loom large in history; a victorious and rejoicing France; a ravaged but liberated Belgium; a subdued and humbled Germany; and the spectacular ceremonies incident to the opening of that historic council which is shaping the destines of mankind and redrawing the map of the world. "Beyond that," I added, "I didn't see very much."

There are certain gratifying privileges incidental to being a Congressman. Being permitted to sail for France before the ink on the armistice was fairly dry was one of them. For you must understand that, although the fighting has ceased, the war will not be officially ended until the treaty of peace has been signed. Tourists and sightseers are not wanted in Europe at this time; the railways, the accommodations and the food are needed for other purposes. If, however, you are fortunate enough to hold an official position, and if you can convince the authorities in Washington that you have a sufficiently sound reason for going and that you are not likely to be either a menace or a nuisance, a special passport will be issued to you. Let me make it quite clear that as a private citizen I probably could not have gone to France at this time, but as the Representative in Congress of a quarter of a million citizens of Massachusetts, I not only was permitted to make the journey, but I was afforded countless facilities and was shown innumerable courtesies by the officers of the armies and the officials of the countries which I visited.

I had applied to the Secretary of State for passports and letters of introduction, also to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, with the result that every facility was placed at my disposal. The Secretary of War put me aboard La France of the French line, and I left New York on the 15th of November. I had read in the New York papers that the French were to enter Strassburg on the 25th of the month, and that Marshal Foch was to enter that city on the 28th, and I determined, if it was a possible thing, I would be in Strassburg on the 25th of November.

So it came about that four days after the representatives of a shattered Germany sullenly affixed their signatures to the armistice in Marshal Foch's private car in the chill of a November dawn, I stood on the deck of a great French liner, streaked and striped by the camoufleurs until it looked like a gigantic zebra outward bound for France.

Late in the summer of 1918 Mr. Ryan, the director of aircraft production, cabled from Europe that I was to be given charge of airplane construction in England. I was as happy as a boy at the beginning of the summer vacation. But after Mr. Ryan's return there was a series of maddening delays. The Aircraft Board wired me to go to Dayton, to Detroit, to New York, then back to Washington. Then, just when my commission was about to be signed, came the armistice! From the bottom of my heart I sympathized with the small boy who at bedtime rushed to his mother exclaiming indignantly, "Oh, mother, the nerve of Emily! praying for peace when father's just been made a captain!"

My trip across the water was uneventful. I found among my fellow passengers a most delightful person, who was no other than M. Delanney, the French ambassador to Japan. I took occasion to ask the ambassador if, as a result of his observation, the Japanese were sincerely proally. To this inquiry the ambassador replied very definitely, "No, sir," and inquired, "Who in the world thought they were sincerely proally?" Ambassador Delanney stated to me that the Japanese intended to support Germany, but after their commission visited here and saw how whole-heartedly we were going into the war they were afraid to do so. Ambassador Delanney stated that he sailed from Japan to Vancouver, and when the party arrived and learned the news that Austria had surrendered the Japanese members of the party were visibly disappointed. He likened the Emperor and the military caste of Japan to that of Germany. He said their methods and ideas and ideals were identical with those of Germany.

We arrived in the harbor of Brest on November 22. M. Delanney very kindly insisted that I should disembark on the launch which was sent out by the French State Department to meet him, which invitation I gladly accepted. As our ship steamed majestically between the fort-crowned promontories which guard the harbor of Brest, "the American port," as it is called, I leaned over the rail and watched, with a thrill of pride and patriotism, that magnificent panorama unfold before me. Here had landed Pershing and the immortal first contingent. Up those narrow, cobble-paved streets which lead from the wharves to the town had tramped 800,000 Yankee fighting men. Brest was more than the gate to France; it was America's gateway to the future. I was told that our troops had been taken ashore in lighters, long strings of them towed by tugs, with the bands playing and the sun glinting on their burnished weapons, and their boyish voices roaring out the chorus of "Good Bye Broadway, Hello France." And to tens of thousands of them it was indeed "Good Bye Broadway," for they sleep under the soil of France.

A friend has told me a story of the landing of the Ninety-second Division, composed of negro troops. As the lighters drew alongside the wharves the interest of the negroes was instantly aroused by the sight of a battalion of French black troops from the West Coast of Africa, who were engaged in unloading ships. A soldier fresh from the cotton plantations of Mississippi was the first man ashore. Approaching a giant Sengalese he confidently held out his hand.

"Hello, niggah!" he called. "How you like it ovah yere in France?"

"Je ne parle Anglais, M'sieu," the Sengalese explained politely.

"Ah's askin' you, niggah," repeated the American, raising his voice, "how you likes it over yere in France?"

"Je ne comprende pas, M'sieu," replied the African. "Parlez vous Francais?"

"Dat ain't no niggah," exclaimed the man from Mississippi, turning away in disgust, "dat's a camouflaged Frenchman."

Though I had seen many phases of our military preparations in the United States it was not until I landed at Brest that I gained any true conception of the magnitude of America's effort. It was a startling revelation. Miles upon miles of wharves bordered by great warehouses of steel and concrete; giant traveling cranes which could dip down into a ship's hold and pick up a locomotive bodily and set it ashore as easily as though it were a baby carriage; a network of rails which looked like the railroad yards of Chicago; scores of panting locomotives and thousands of box and flat cars stenciled with the magic letters "U. S. A."; mountains of ammunition, food, fodder, clothing, weapons, supplies of every description; and swarms of soldiers from the labor battalions in canvas hats and blue denim uniforms, working like the unloading gang of a circus. The metamorphosis of Brest, whereby a comparatively unimportant French seaport, with antiquated docking and unloading facilities, was transformed in the space of a few months into one of the world's great harbors, was one of the most remarkable accomplishments of the war. And the work was done, mind you, by a handful of Engineer officers, most of them fresh from civil life, and a few thousand negro stevedores, Chinese laborers, and German prisoners. At this port we disembarked between dawn and dark of a single day upward of 34,000 men—equivalent to the population of a good-sized city. As I looked down from the ancient ramparts of the town on this scene of breathless industry I could not but wonder how the French were impressed by this exhibition of American energy and efficiency. I learned when I met the French admiral who commands at Brest.

"You Americans are a wonderful people," he told me. "You have taught us many valuable lessons by which we shall profit. You do everything in such a big way. When we wanted to send an important message we intrusted it to a courier. But when your general had a message to send he built a telegraph line."

The first serious check I received in my program to get to Strassburg on the 25th of November was the fact that every seat was taken on the train from Brest to Paris, but the Goddess of Fortune was with me again, for when M. Delanney learned of my predicament he took me to the admiral of the port, who promptly issued orders that accommodations be reserved for me on the train, and so I arrived in Paris the next morning. The French ambassador insisted that his military attaché, Lieut. Corjon, take me to my hotel, handle my baggage, find out about the trains to Chaumont, Gen. Pershing's headquarters, and also arrange with the police for passes to go outside of Paris and into the war zone. I never could have gotten out of Paris the same day I had arrived had it not been for the kindness and courtesy of the ambassador and his lieutenant.

Though the armistice had been signed a dozen days before, I found Paris still in the throes of rejoicing over the end of the great conflict. The hotels were jammed, the restaurants were jammed, the streets were jammed. It seemed as though the armies of the entente had been turned loose in the French capital. Laughing, chattering poilus in worn and grimy uniforms which had once been horizon blue, Americans and British in khaki, Italians in rat-colored gray, Anzacs in their peculiar belted blouses and their broad-brimmed hats turned up at one side, Poles in light blue, piped with scarlet, Serbs in tight-waisted tunics that made them look as though they were wearing corsets, Algerians and Moroccans with their fierce hawk faces peering out from under their turbans, and, of course, the Parisiennes, than whom, whether they are grandes dames or grisettes, there are no smarter—or braver—women in the world. The great asphalt expanse of the Place de la Concorde had been transformed into a vast museum of the war, crowded with every conceivable form of battle trophy, from the skeleton of a German Zeppelin to trench mortars which could be carried by a single soldier. The bases of the statues at the end of the Tuileries Gardens were hidden by ramparts made of German helmets. Stretching right across one side of the great plaza was a row of German airplanes which had been brought down by French fliers, some of them painted fantastically in red and black—red for the Red Cross hospitals which they had bombed, black for the weeds worn by the widows and orphans they had made.

AN AVENUE OF CAPTURED FIELD GUNS.

The Champs Elysées, that splendid thoroughfare which runs from the Place de la Concorde to the Arc de Triomphe, a distance equal to that from the Treasury to the Capitol in Washington, was lined on either side, from end to end, by captured field guns standing wheel to wheel. And the people were permitted to do with these guns, and with the other trophies displayed in the Place de la Concorde precisely as they pleased. There were neither guards nor railings nor "Do not touch" placards. Laughing youngsters sat astride the grim barrels which had belched death on the Marne and at Verdun; wounded soldiers demonstrated to their admiring relatives how they worked the machine guns and trench mortars.

"Does Your Excellency know that the trophies in the Champs Elysées are quite unguarded?" someone asked the prime minister, M. Clemenceau. "The people are doing with them as they please; some of them may be stolen."

"Eh, bien," replied the Tiger. "Who has a better right to them than the people? It was the French people who won the war. And what if a few of them are taken, mon ami? There are plenty more where these came from."

But nothing, not the cheering crowds nor the captured airplanes and cannon, brought home to me the fact that war is over, that the war had been won, as did that statue in the Place de la Concorde which symbolizes the city of Strassburg. For eight-and-forty years that statue had been draped in black, as symbolic of France's mourning for the lost Provinces. But now the mourning had been torn away and the statue was literally hidden beneath heaps of flowers and flags, flags and flowers. As I stood on the crowded pavement and stared up at the carven figure of a seated woman, it seemed to me that these heroic features typified not merely Alsace-Lorraine, but France herself—courageous, patient, indomitable, serene.

WHAT THE FRENCH FOUGHT FOR.

It is the little things, rather than the big ones, which usually leave the most lasting impression, and it was a story, told me over a dinner table, which brought home to me more vividly than all the splendid spectacles which I witnessed, just what this victory means to the French people. A party of officers—an Englishman, a Russian, an Italian, and a Frenchman—were dining together one evening. After dinner they went out to have their coffee and cigars in the garden. And while they were smoking they fell into a discussion of the causes which led their respective nations into the war.

"We went to war because of the invasion of Belgium," said the Englishman. "We had guaranteed her neutrality—and, besides, Belgium in German hands would be a pistol held at the head of England."

"The Tsar declared war," asserted the Russian, "to save our fellow Slavs of Serbia from extinction."

"We are fighting for Italia Irridenta," exclaimed the Italian, bringing his fist down upon the table so that the dishes rattled. "The Trentino, Trieste, Istria, Dalmatia, in order to secure our national safety we must have them all."

The Frenchman, seeing the questioning eyes of the others fixed upon him, leaned over and from the ground scooped up a handful of earth.

"This is what we are fighting for," he said simply, and pressed it to his lips.

It is such exhibitions of unashamed sentiment which gratify and delight all Frenchmen. If they love anything they are not ashamed to say so. But we Americans, like our British cousins, make a practice of hiding our emotions beneath a cloak of indifference and matter-of-factness. It is not an American characteristic to "wear our heart on our sleeve." Strangely enough it took a professional soldier, a grim and taciturn fighting man, to show the French that we are in reality not so devoid of sentiment as they had always believed. One of the first requests which Gen. Pershing made after his arrival in France was to be taken to the tomb of Lafayette. The group of high officers and officials who accompanied him naturally expected that, after laying the wreath which he had brought with him on the tomb, he would make a speech. But he did nothing of the sort. His simple "Lafayette, we are here," surprised and delighted the French.

And when, upon his visit to Les Invalides, the sword of Napoleon was brought to him, he neither spoke nor took it in his hands, but bent and kissed the blade. Those two incidents, apparently insignificant as they were, together with his offer to brigade American troops with the French, did more than all his military qualities to win for the American commander in chief the sympathy and admiration of the French.

PERPETUATING THE MEMORY OF GUYNEMER.

In those days before the great war, when it was our careless custom to generalize about other peoples, we used to remark, rather condescendingly, I fear, that the French were a temperamental, volatile, sentimental people. No one has accused them of being volatile since the Marne and Verdun, but the charge of sentimentalism remains. The pity is that we Americans have not more sentiment. We are too self-conscious, we hold ourselves too much in check, we act as though we were afraid that should we venture to be natural or to show our emotions we would be laughed at. We pride ourselves on being practical and matter of fact. In recent years George Washington has been as well known as the name of a brand of coffee as the Father of his Country—imagine the French permitting a brand of tea to be named after Napoleon. Sherman's chief claim to fame, from the standpoint of the man in the street, is that he once said "War is hell." We presented a house to the hero of Manila, but he promptly ceased to be a hero to us when he presented the house to his wife. This war has given us national heroes a plenty, from "Go-to-hell" Whittlesey, of the Lost Battalion, to "Eddie" Rickenbacker and "Hobey" Baker. Yet, by any stretch of the imagination can you conceive of American schools setting aside a day to commemorate the exploits of Baker, as the French schools did not long ago, in order to perpetuate in the minds of its children the memory of the great French ace, Guynemer?

I have here a copy of the letter written by the mistress of this little village school to Guynemer's mother. Let me read it to you:

MADAME: You have already received the sorrowful and grateful sympathy of official France and of France as a nation; I am venturing to send you the naïve and sincere homage of young France, as represented by our school children at Bouclans. Before receiving from our chiefs the suggestion, of which we learn to-day, we had already, on the 22d of October, consecrated a day to the memory of our hero, Guynemer, your glorious son.

I send you inclosed an exercise by one of my pupils, chosen at random, for all of them are animated by the same sentiments. You will see how the immortal glory of your son shines even in the humble villages, and that the admiration and gratitude which the children, so far away in the country, feel for our greatest aviator, will be piously and faithfully preserved in his memory.

May this sincere testimony to the sentiments of childhood be of some comfort to your grief, to which I offer my most profound respect.

C. S.,
The School Mistress of Bouclans.

And this is the exercise, written by Paul Bailly, aged 11 years and 10 months:

Guynemer is the Roland of our epoch; like Roland he was very brave, and like Roland he died for France. But his exploits are not a legend like those of Roland, and in telling them just as they happened we find them more beautiful than any we could imagine. To do honor to him they are going to write his name in the Pantheon, among the other great names. His airplane has been placed in the Invalides. In our school we consecrated a day to him. This morning, as soon as we reached the school, we put his photograph upon the wall; for our moral lesson we learned by heart his last mention in the dispatches; for our writing lesson we wrote his name, and he was the subject for our theme; and finally we had to draw an airplane. We did not begin to think of him only after he was dead; before he died, in our school, every time he brought down an airplane we were proud and happy. But when we heard that he was dead we were as sad as if one of our own family had died.

Roland was the example for all the knights in history. Guynemer should be the example for Frenchmen now, and each one will try to imitate him and will remember him as we have remembered Roland. I, especially, shall never forget him, for I shall remember that he died for France, like my dear papa.

As a young man I had visited Paris and took that walk which is one of the loveliest in all the world, down the Champs d'Elysees from the Arc de Triomphe to the Place de la Concorde—and it came to be called the Champs d'Elysees from a remark that Louis XIV made one day when he was being wheeled out by an attendant. He inquired, looking at the fields on either side of the road, "What could be more beautiful than this? Surely not even the Elysian fields." Hence the name, Champs d'Elysees.

I doubt whether there be another capital in Europe which can offer a monument of more majestic calm than Paris does in its Place de la Concorde.

And yet, could the stones of the great Place but speak they could tell tales of murder, carnage, and of riot. As late as the middle of the eighteenth century the great site, nearly 400 yards in length and 235 yards wide, which lies between the Tuileries Gardens and the Seine, was practically a desert. In 1763 an equestrian statue to King Louis XV was erected there, on which a wit scribbled the following pasquinade, which has become historical:

O la belle statue! O le beau piedestal!
Les vertus sont a pied, la vice est a cheval.

Thirty years later the statue was replaced by one of Liberty, and the Place Louis Quinze became La Place de la Revolution. Here the grim memories of the Revolution concentrate, for between January 21, 1793, when Louis XVI died upon the guillotine on the exact spot where the south side fountain with the figures emblematic of marine navigation stands to-day, and May 3, 1795, the stones of the Place ran in rivulets of blood, and 2,800 people perished under the biting kiss of La Petite Louison, as the guillotine was called.

It was then that superstitious people recollected that the Place had been of evil augury from the festivities which marked its building, for before the rejoicings terminated on the inauguration of the statue to Louis XV a fearful crush occurred on the unfinished Place, and no less than 300 people perished, while the tale of maimed and wounded ran into four figures. On the morning following the fête, Mercier says, 133 bodies were found upon the Place.

As I have said, Louis XVI died here upon the guillotine, where later Charlotte Corday, Marie Antoinette, Philippe Egalite, Madame Elizabeth—the sister of Louis XVI—Danton, Camille Desmoulins, Robespierre, and many others perished.

It was here, too, that, on April 10, 1814, the armies of the Russian, Prussian, and Austrian invaders were reviewed. A te deum for the triumph of the allies and the restoration of the Bourbons was sung at an altar raised in the middle of the Place, and a salute of a hundred guns was fired to commemorate the renaming of it as the Place Louis XV.

Here, too, another army—that of the invading Germans—took up position in March, 1871, and in May of the same year the Place Louis XV was the scene of many a fierce conflict between the Versailles troops and Communards, who had erected barricades at the end of the Rue Royale.

The obelisk upon the Place de la Concorde is the sister monolith to Cleopatra's Needle. It is 76 feet in height, weighs 240 tons, and was presented to Louis Philippe by the then Viceroy of Egypt, Mohammed Ali. It was at the foot of the Assouan obelisk that, on February 24, 1848, Louis Philippe and Marie Amelie waited in agony for their carriages, which were being burned by the people in the Tuileries.

Round La Place de la Concorde are the eight great allegorical statues typifying France's eight chief cities. That of Strassburg is always draped in crêpe and wreathed with immortelles, in token of the loss of Alsace and Lorraine to France.

This trip to Paris was my eighth, and ties of sentiment and business had been the occasion of my visits from time to time. My twenty-first birthday was celebrated by a trip to Paris, and from there I brought home the first motor cars which were ever brought through the port of Boston. At a later date I was married in Paris. Anyone visiting France in the last 50 years has become familiar with the story of the great statue of Strassburg—Strassburg, the capital of Alsace, that Province of which Germany robbed France after the war of 1870. From time to time wreaths of flowers have been placed upon it, and all loyal Frenchmen have vowed that some day Alsace and Lorraine would be restored to France. It has upon the base of its pedestal this legend: "France quand Même." Not being a French scholar, I have on numerous occasions asked different Frenchmen to translate this for me, but none have ever appeared to be quite satisfied that they could translate it into English with all of its significance. In substance, it means that during all these years France has considered Strassburg hers. It also means, in the opinion of others, that Strassburg will belong to France in spite of all. The fact that the statue was draped in mourning by the French, the flowers upon it, the sign beneath, fascinated me. It seemed related, in my imagination, to the definition the Good Book gives of faith, namely, "The substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." Surely, France loved Alsace and Lorraine, and Alsace-Lorraine loved France, and let us hope that never again will history record such a cruel parting as was that of 1870—that of the Provinces of Alsace and Lorraine from France.

May I take the liberty of saying here that I wish our Government, instead of devoting millions of dollars to the erection of unnecessary post offices and other public buildings, would make an adequate appropriation for the encouragement of the arts and sciences, as France does. Why should not our mint strike off medals in commemoration of the glorious events in American history? Why should we not give prizes in recognition of great productions in painting and sculpture? Are not these things an inspiration to the youth of our land, which surely lead them to loftier planes of thought and living? Is it not the surest means of combating materialism, at whose shrine Germany worshipped and as a result of which she was led into a lust of materialism and final downfall? Have we not learned from our experience in this war that an intangible something, called morale, is as potent an influence upon victory as guns and gunpowder, and is it too wild a flight of the imagination to say that the encouragement of the arts and sciences—music, painting, and sculpture—makes for a higher morale of our people, for loftier thinking, nobler actions, higher ideals, and better citizenship?

I left Paris on the morning of the 24th for Chaumont.

At Chaumont, a little town in the Department of the Haute-Marne, six hours by train southeast of Paris, was the general headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces. To Gen. McAndrew, chief of the general staff, I presented the letters which I had brought with me from Washington, and it was due to his courtesy and assistance that I was able to reach Strassburg in time to witness the triumphal entry of Marshal Foch, for he assigned to me a military car and an officer who was to act as my guide. The conducting officer was Capt. Robert Warwick, who has been seen by most Americans either across the footlights or on the motion-picture screen. Accompanied by Capt. Warwick, I went to the French état major, presented my credentials, and asked for a pass to visit Strassburg.

"Mon Dieu!" said the French officer, holding up his hands; "Strassburg is still in Germany. How, then, can I give you a pass into Germany?"

Capt. Warwick explained, however, that he had instructions from the American general headquarters to get me to Strassburg by the 25th, whereupon the Frenchman settled the matter by writing out a pass, which read, "Anywhere through the French lines for 30 days." It was the first pass issued into Strassburg.

Strassburg, the historic capital of Alsace, is on the Ill, 2 miles from the Rhine, being divided by the river into several sections. The old French fortifications, designed by Vauban, have been replaced by a modern German system, consisting of a chain of barrier forts, 14 in all, at a distance of from 3 to 5 miles from the center of the town. The narrow, winding, cobble-paved streets, the old, old buildings with their curious façades, the splendid buildings of the university, and the towering spire of the ancient cathedral combine to give the city a peculiarly quaint and medieval appearance, the picturesqueness of its streets being enhanced by the thousands of returned soldiers in both French and German uniforms. An extraordinary situation existed in Strassburg at this time, for Germany conscripted 600,000 men from Alsace-Lorraine, and upon the signing of the armistice a considerable proportion of these came flocking back, still wearing their German uniforms, to a city which had become French overnight.

Mingling in the streets of this city, which for nearly half a century had been under German rule, were soldiers in German field gray and soldiers in French horizon blue, and, to add to the confusion, thousands of released British prisoners in khaki. So crowded was the city that my companion and I were unable to find a room, being eventually forced to accept the hospitality of a German captain of cavalry, the Rittmeister Ullrich, who placed at our disposal rooms in his chateau. A curious situation, was it not? I, an American Congressman, the guest of an officer of the German Army which we had just been fighting.

I took occasion to inquire of Capt. Ullrich why in the world it was that the Germans brought America into the war, and his reply was that this was a diplomatic mistake, and he added that all their mistakes were diplomatic mistakes. I asked what they thought after we entered the war; if they thought we could not fight or would not fight; to which he replied that they thought we could not get over, but the Germans knew that if we did get over they were done for, and that when they found we were coming over en masse they quit.

Gen. Gouraud, the one-armed hero of Gallipoli, who commanded in Strassburg at this time, is one of the most picturesque and gallant figures in all the armies of France. Seldom have I seen a more striking figure; a tall, slender, graceful man, with a long, brown, spade-shaped beard, which did not entirely conceal a mouth both sensitive and firm. But it was the eyes which attracted and held my attention—great, lustrous eyes, but which could on occasion, I fancy, become as cold as steel or angry as lightning. One sleeve of his tunic hung empty, and he leaned heavily on a cane, for during the landing at Gallipoli he was terribly wounded by a Turkish shell. He is a remarkable man, this soldier with the beard of a poilu and the eyes of a poet, and had the war continued I doubt not that he would have won the baton of a marshal of France.

Gen. Gouraud thought it strange that I should be stopping in Strassburg as the guest of a German officer. Maj. McGrew, my French conducting officer, caught the humor of the situation, explained to Gen. Gouraud how it all happened, and I think no small degree perhaps of the courtesies extended by Gen. Gouraud to me while in Strassburg were the result of the acquaintance brought about by this peculiar incident. It will be among the pleasantest memories of my life to recall the various considerate things the French did for me that were entirely uncalled for, but were none the less appreciated.

On November 25 I had the pleasure of meeting Gen. Mitchell, who commanded all combat flying machines on the American front. He seemed to be a very young man to be a general, but after talking with him it was easy to understand the rapid advancement which had put him in charge of the American air forces. He was the personification of life, energy, and enthusiasm. Gen. Mitchell sincerely hopes that appropriations will be made so that the aircraft branch of the Army can be further developed and maintained as a strong arm of our national defense. He said the value of airplanes could not be overestimated as a method of observation and for policing territory.

The state entry of Marshal Foch into Strassburg was to take place on November 28, and promptly at 9.15 on that morning a staff captain, sent by Gen. Gouraud, called for us in a military car and escorted us to the barracks, where the reception to the generalissimo was to take place. Drawn up in a hollow square in the great rectangle formed by the barracks were six regiments of French infantry, with their bands and colors. Half an hour's wait and the clear notes of a bugle suddenly turned the soldiers into statues. Another bugle call and the rifles came to "Present, arms," while the massed bands burst into the splendid strains of the Marseillaise. Then into the courtyard poured such a procession as I shall probably never see again—a squadron of Spahis, Algerian horsemen in white turbans and streaming red burnouses, mounted on white and wiry desert horses, riding amid a forest of lances under a cloud of fluttering white-and-scarlet pennons. Hard at their heels came a cavalcade of French officers representing every branch of the service—cuirassiers, dragoons, hussars, chasseurs, engineers, colonials—and at their head, mounted on a white charger, the breast of his sky-blue tunic ablaze with stars and crosses, I caught a glimpse of Ferdinand Foch, marshal of France, commander in chief of the armies of civilization, the hero of the Marne, and the conqueror of the Hun. It was one of those moments which will always remain a white milestone on the road to memory.

Marshal Foch had scarcely finished reviewing the troops when the officers who were conducting me hustled me into a car and rushed me to the Place Kléber, where the city was to extend its welcome. In the center of the square rises the statue of Gen. Jean Baptiste Kléber, born in Strassburg, the French soldier who commanded the armies of Napoleon at the passage of the Rhine near Dusseldorf, who was intrusted by the Emperor with the command of the French armies in Egypt, and who met his death at the hands of an Arab fanatic in Cairo. Though a space around the base of the statue had been kept clear, the sidewalks, the windows, and the housetops were a solid mass of humanity. And when the marshal, still riding his white charger, rode slowly into the square, that mass of humanity went insane. Pulling up his horse before the statue, the marshal drew from its scabbard the sword of Kléber, which had been brought him from the museum, and, raising the flashing blade in air, sat motionless at the salute while the drums rolled and the bugles shrieked and the people cheered themselves hoarse and the housetops rocked and swayed.

The final scene of this never-to-be-forgotten spectacle, the scene which I shall probably remember the longest, came a little later in the day, when the marshal visited the great cathedral to give solemn thanks to the God of Victories. This time, instead of the acclaimed and glittering hero, I saw the figure of a tired, worn man, his shoulders bowed, and his face lined by the terrible burden which he has carried, kneeling on the steps of the high altar, where countless emperors and kings and heroes had knelt before him, giving thanks to God.

Describing these scenes in Strassburg, Premier Clemenceau said in the French Senate that in the city of Strassburg, where the teaching of French had been forbidden in the public schools, where men with distinctly French names had been obliged to change them to German, he was greeted by the singing of the Marseillaise; others cried, "Vive la France!" and the voices of the rest were drowned in a sob.

In the opinion of many people in France the church influence has been greatly rehabilitated, due to the wonderful bravery and devotion of the priests who have accompanied the troops, suffering all their privations, and in a great many instances have been wounded and decorated for bravery. In Strassburg I saw a priest who was at least 50 years of age, with his right arm amputated at the shoulder, wearing on his breast a croix de guerre, with two palms, indicating that on two occasions he had demonstrated his personal bravery.

I took occasion after the services at the cathedral were over to view the famous Strassburg clock, which is in the cathedral. The architectural beauty of the Strassburg Cathedral is known all over the world. That night we made it a point to visit the principal restaurants of Strassburg, and to say that joy was unrestrained would be to describe the situation mildly. I recall that at one of the largest restaurants of Strassburg, the name of which escapes me, the entire orchestra was made up of poilus, and the leader of the band and the first violinist were decorated with the croix de guerre. I had never heard the Madelon, one of the old popular French songs, sung before, or Marguerita, another very tuneful song, and a third one called Margot. I had no difficulty in view of the number of times that these were sung and encored to learn them. Instead of applauding a piece that meets with popular approval in the American way, in northern France the method of applause is to make three distinct claps in three series, after which a single clap. That indicates that the audience offers its most hearty approval. Words utterly fail me in attempting to describe the enthusiasm of these people over the return of this territory to France. Old ladies, who I am sure had not danced for a great many years, were drinking champagne and having the time of their lives. These women, who composed the society of Strassburg and into whose homes the Germans had never been invited or even admitted, were greeting everybody in a most democratic spirit and were in very truth joyful.

It was in Strassburg that I learned from the American liaison officer of an interview that took place on the western front somewhere near the Dixmude sector between Marshal Foch and Gen. French, of the British Army, just prior to a contemplated retreat of the British forces. Marshal Foch reminded Gen. French that never in history had England retreated leaving an ally to perish, and that he, Foch, had ordered the French to die to the last man before retreating an inch, and Gen. French, with the tears streaming down his face, promised to make the stand, and as a result the French and British forces held their ground and stopped the Germans.

It was at Strassburg that I first saw a German lüger officer's pistol. These pistols are carried in a leather holster and strapped to the holster is a wooden piece of the same length as the pistol and in shape and size is a duplicate of the butt of a rifle. This wooden piece attached to the handle of the pistol changes a revolver into a rifle capable of accurately firing a thousand yards. Later on I was able to pick up one of these rifles at Verdun, and prize it as one of the best relics I secured during my trip.

In Strassburg we found that all the string was made of paper. An old gentleman told me out in front of the hotel one morning that rubber tires on our motor car were the first rubber tires he had seen in several years, and that they had been using steel tires, rope, and blocks of wood in place of rubber, which was very scarce.

The third morning of our stay at the chateau we learned that all the Germans of the city had been ordered to turn in firearms of every kind, and we could not help being slightly curious as to just how our German captain host would return his. You can imagine it would be a bit embarrassing for a German captain, certainly one with the military bearing of our host, to march through the streets of Strassburg to the city hall and surrender his sword and rifles, and so forth. But the captain solved the problem by sending his housekeeper with his arms and ammunition.

During the first few days of occupation of Strassburg the populace showed their resentment toward those of German sympathy who had been particularly obnoxious during the years of German control, with the result that there were some windows broken and some stores were obliged to close. In watching these demonstrations in the street I noticed an old, distinguished-looking Frenchman, who told me why the Alsatians were forcing Germans to close their shops, and he explained to me what it meant to the Alsatians having the French back on their soil again, and he went on to relate how he had been a French soldier and had fought in 1870. I said to him, "These must be days of great emotion for you." "No, no," he said, placing his hand over his heart, "Not emotion; ecstacy."

I recall the incident of a French soldier who entered with our troops. He went to the cemetery where his grandfather was buried, having been killed in the Franco-Prussian War of 1870. The French soldier knelt on the grave and placing there a small French flag whispered, "They are here, grandfather."

From Strassburg we went to Metz, where reservations had been made for us at the Hotel de l'Europe. We lunched at Zaberne, which was the place where the German military officer struck down a cobbler. That incident, while not of grave importance by itself, perhaps gave Americans their first inkling of the arrogance with which German officers treated civilians. Not only should this officer have been punished for striking down a civilian, but instead of this he was honored for it.

At Metz the first night of our arrival 12,000 British prisoners marched into the city singing, "It's a long, long way to Picadilly, but our heart's still there." In the city of Metz only one shell had ever reached the city. There was some slight damage done by bombs from airplanes, but, practically speaking, the city was unharmed. In fact, as a broad, general statement it might be said that the entire territory of Alsace and Lorraine was untouched, the French having refused to bombard it, inasmuch as they expected eventually to have it returned to them. I was told that Gen. Pershing lined up his guns to bombard some of the Alsatian cities, with the result that Premier Clemenceau, as soon as he heard of it, left Paris and succeeded in convincing Pershing that such action would be a great mistake.

Early last spring Marshal Foch said that if the Germans did not retreat to the line of Metz he would have them out of France by Christmas. The Metz line is the one they would naturally have retreated to had it not been for the internal troubles and loss of morale that brought about the collapse.

From Metz we proceeded to Verdun, and here I commenced for the first time to see what trench warfare meant, and graves and crosses that were row on row. Here I saw the gates of the citadel through which over 2,000,000 French soldiers had passed. The Germans never had actually succeeded in getting into the city, and most of the damage was done to the northern forts. It was at Verdun that I learned of the American who offered his sympathy to a Frenchman who had lost both arms, to which the Frenchman replied, holding out the two stumps, "I wanted to give my life, but they only took my arms."

At Souilly I had the pleasure of dining at the American mess, and it was a most enjoyable occasion. The food was very good and the boys seemed happy and contented. The boys at that time were not at all unhappy as they became later. They then thought the War Department would be as interested in getting them home as they were in getting them over. It is unfortunate that they have been disillusioned in this respect.

Here I took occasion to ask Gen. McNear if he thought the generally accredited reason for the German surrender was true—namely, that there was a great food shortage in Germany. He said, "No; but when the German people learned the truth as to the reasons why they were at war it broke down their morale, which in turn brought about their surrender."

Leaving Gen. McNear's headquarters, I went back to the mess and had a fine meal of bacon, potatoes, bread and butter, raspberry jam, and coffee. The cook told me that the potatoes we were to have for dinner had been planted by the French, the territory having later been taken by the Germans. Before harvest time the French had recaptured this section, and stepping to the door, at his suggestion, I saw the German prisoners just finishing up the peeling of these potatoes for the American meal.

At Souilly I was told by an officer of the story of a colored fellow who was in the trenches looking very gray and frightened, and the commanding officer making his rounds stopped and said to him, "What is the matter with you, George? Are you sick?" To which the coon replied, "No, sir; but I don't like the way dose shells are talking to me to-night." The major said, "You don't mean to say that those shells talk?" He said, "Yas, sir; dey talks to me. I can understand dem." Just then one of them came over and made that noise which is similar to the tearing of a linen collar and ended with a bang. Just then the coon said, "Do you hear dat one, boss? Dat one done say to me, 'Nigger, yo ain't neber goin' back to Alabam.'"

I am going to take the liberty of telling this little story, which may appear sacrilegious. On the other hand, I am sure that anyone visiting those boys at the front who have so recently been through life and death, suffering and carnage, would be very tolerant in criticizing anything that they did or said. This story as it was told to me was in regard to a lot of colored fellows from down South, who, after arriving on a transport and being here a few weeks, were sent to a training camp where colored boys in the front-line trenches came back to rest. One of the new coons meeting an old-timer said, "Ole boy, whats dis yere meanin' 'Ober de top?'" "Why, yere boy," replied the old-timer, "Don't yo' know what 'Ober de top' means? Dat means dey're going to teach yo' how to use de bayonet an' how to use de hand grenade and how to use dat rifle. Den after yo' niggers knows dat, dey're goin' to send yo' up to de tranches. Den you're goin' to watch in de rain an' de cold an' de mud wid de Boche shootin' at yo' an' throwin' dese minnewerfers at yo', an' den one day word comes dat yo're goin' ober de top, and den yo stan' waitin' an' when de minute comes when yo' have to go ober dat top yo' starts wid yo' teeth a-chatterin' to go up de ladder. Yo' goes up an' up till just as yo' reaches de top yo' put yore haid ober an' yo' just says, 'Good mawnin', Jesus.'"

As a matter of fact, our negro troops fought as bravely as any others. In one of the French newspapers there was a picture of a South Carolina nigger who was awarded the croix de guerre. This cartoon represented a big colored man looking through an enlarged croix de guerre, and underneath these words, "Black, but red, white, and blue."

The night before Christmas I went to the services at the Madelaine, in Paris, and words utterly fail me in any attempt I might make to describe the thoughts that came to mind at the sight of French soldiers in uniform who had been fighting for four and one-half years standing there so peaceably at divine service, coming from the battle area with the picture of what they had been through so freshly in mind; it seemed easy to understand how peaceable and satisfying it must be to them to get back where they could express their gratitude for having escaped the calamities of death and disaster that had befallen so many of their comrades. I could not help but be reminded as I looked into the faces of these men who had been through so much and who now looked so peaceable and happy of those words of Shakespeare, "Sweet are the uses of adversity."

Christmas Day I visited the Massachusetts Club, at Hotel Lotti, with Congressman CARTER and Mr. Connolly, of the Stars and Stripes. I hope that Mr. and Mrs. Frothingham have the satisfaction of knowing some of the pleasures and happiness and comfort they have given the boys from Massachusetts who have been in Paris and who have utilized these very comfortable quarters which they have provided. All the Boston papers were at this club. There was a piano and a phonograph. In fact, it was quite the most comfortable place that I had struck on my trip. I remember meeting Mr. Grozier, of the Boston Post, shortly afterwards, who complained that he had not seen one of his papers in a month. Inasmuch as I had just read all of the Boston papers at the Massachusetts Club, I suggested that he call there too, which opportunity he was very glad to improve.

My American trip started from Paris and took us through Seulis, which was the extreme limit of the German advance in 1914. From there we went to Compaigne, outside of which, at a distance of 4 miles, are the forests of Laigne, which was the farthest point the Germans reached on July 15, 1918. Next was Noyon, which is the nearest city to Paris which is completely destroyed. Next to that we visited Guisecard, which was demolished on July 18. Noyon was retaken by the French in August, 1918. Next we went to Ham, which has been the center of the two battles of the Somme. Around Ham and St. Quentin there is hardly a foot of space between the shell craters. These cities were not retaken until August and September, 1918. Outside all the houses was metal work of every kind, which the Germans were assembling to take back into Germany. All copper and brass was taken from the machinery. Practically all the roads around St. Quentin were destroyed. We rode for miles over wooden planks. Bohain was the first town in October, 1918, where British and Americans, upon taking the town, met the civilians. Between Amiens and Bohain, a distance of 90 kilometers, not a single house can be found standing or a single inhabitant living. This 90 kilometers between Amiens and Bohain is as the crow flies. By road it is 140 kilometers.

From Bohain we went to St. Souplis, St. Quentin, Vermand, straight on to Amiens. The next day we lunched at Compeigne, in which town there is not a single electric light. The hotel had been partially destroyed and was being rebuilt. This hotel, named the Paris, was the only one open in the town. The cathedral at Amiens, practically speaking, was undamaged. The town was totally evacuated from March 30, 1918, to September 20 to the last inhabitant. Col. Wilmer, of the British Army, treated us royally while we were at St. Quentin.

From Amiens we went to Corby, which was the headquarters of the Twenty-seventh Division in October for a month. This city was never occupied by the Germans, who got within 3 miles in April, 1918.

We then went to Vellers-Brettanaux, which was entirely destroyed. The Germans came through this town approaching Amiens. At Carbonelles-Brettanaux we could not find the town at all, it had been so totally destroyed, but finally we came upon a sign reading, "This was Carbonelles-Brettanaux," and in this town it could truthfully be said that the curbstones were higher than the steeples, and all that was left of the town was a scar.

We next visited Peronne, which was an ancient fortified city and the seat of Louis XI. It was one of those walled cities with a moat about it. This section has been a battle field for centuries.

At Roysel I had the opportunity of dining with some British Tommies, also of securing some holsters, revolvers, knives, guns, and other souvenirs. It was at this point that the British Tommies told me that German prisoners said that the first thing American soldiers did after they captured them was to remove their hats, medals, pistols, and equipment of that sort as souvenirs.

At Hardincourt we were given a demonstration by Lieut. Flaubert of the Very pistols, which are used for shooting star shells at the front.

The English seemed to have a way of making themselves more comfortable with limited facilities than anybody else.

Another feature of the British front is what are called "elephant iron huts." These consist of large pieces of sheet iron, which are oval. Two of these with a third one across when joined make a very satisfactory roof for a dugout. When constructed they are also known sometimes as the "Nisson steel huts."

At Vincourt we passed by the headquarters formerly occupied by Gen. O'Ryan. The first place we struck the Hindenburg line was at the Bellecourt tunnel of the St. Quentin Canal. For miles around this section we traveled over plank roads. It was explained how these roads were laid and relaid by British engineers under shell fire.

At Mons we saw a series of German pill boxes, the walls of which were 9 feet thick, and some dugouts ran down into the earth with as many as 30 steps. These dugouts were equipped with electric lights, telephones, and so forth.

Outside of Ypres we visited what is probably the largest graveyard for soldiers in France. It contains something like 20,000 bodies, two bodies being in each grave. These graves were marked with the white cross with the soldier's name and regiment and the date of his death thereon.

Some of the very fiercest fighting, if not the fiercest, in the entire war, was in the Argonne Forest, and no division made a better record there than our Twenty-sixth New England and the Seventy-seventh New York. American troops went through this section so rapidly that in some instances German machine gunners were captured in the trees three days afterwards.

French business men have told me that the one great lesson that they have learned as the result of the war has been quantity production, and anyone familiar with French industrial affairs knows that their goods have been made by small concerns in little factories scattered here and there. The war made it necessary that large quantities of supplies should be made and the Government financed the undertaking, and in this way French manufacturers have been given an opportunity of increasing their facilities and broadening their viewpoint.

A story, however, that was most distressing to me, and one in which I have confidence, is that at a number of points along the line American troops, the day after the armistice was signed, were put over the top. I understand that the English lost 20,000 men in order that they might have English troops in Mons when hostilities ceased, which was the point where they started from in 1914. My humble opinion would be that nothing in the world warranted any officer in forfeiting the life of a single private soldier unnecessarily. I have been told by men who were there that at the River Ceille, south of Metz, American troops under Gen. Bellew, of the Ninety-second Division, were ordered over the top at 7 o'clock in the morning the day after the armistice was signed, and firing was to stop at 10. At 11 o'clock what were left of these troops marched peaceably into Germany.

One great difficulty in the Army system and methods, in my opinion, is that the General Staff proceeds on the theory that any Army officer can do every job well. In business we recognize that the average bookkeeper does not make a good sales manager, and vice versa. But apparently the Army does not believe in specialists, and the result is that there are a great many round pegs trying to fill square holes.

The English commissary department has apparently the best system of transportation for its rations, with the result that English troops are only given rations for the ensuing 24 hours, Americans carrying a supply for 10 days.

In our war preparations we apparently made three mistakes of a similar nature in connection with airplanes, artillery, and machine guns. Our airplane failure was due to the fact that we started out to design a new machine from the ground up rather than to start building at once those airplanes which our allies had developed. Had we followed the latter program we should have had machines which could have been put into immediate production, and if we had developed an American machine that was superior we could put that into production after its superiority had been demonstrated beyond question. When we went into the war France offered us the blue prints and all the manufacturing secrets of the French 75, the greatest piece of artillery developed during the war. Their one stipulation was that the recoil mechanism should be assembled by Frenchmen. Our War Department declined this offer with the intimation that we could build something better than the French 75. The result was that we wasted a year's time, finally accepted the French plans, and when the war closed, it is my understanding, we had on the western front only about 111 of these guns.

We made a somewhat similar mistake in connection with the machine guns. Instead of taking the Lewis gun we experimented with the Browning. Our mistake in connection with the machine guns, however, was not so serious as with airplanes and artillery. The Browning proved eventually to be an excellent gun. It might be interesting to note here that the French lengthened out their machine-gun fire 1,000 yards by using copper bullets.

Through the courtesy of the British Government I was given a military conducting officer, Capt. Haig Bovey, and a motor car, and the trip included visits at Amiens, Ypres, Albert, Bapaume, Cambray, Lille, Roubaix, Tourcoigne, Vimy Ridge, Messines, St. Quentin, and parts of Belgium. I had the opportunity while on this trip of visiting the Bellecourt Tunnel of the St. Quentin Canal. This canal is about 3½ miles long and it was entirely filled with barges, and these barges were fitted up with sleeping quarters, telephones, electric lights, and conveniences of every kind. A great many thousands of Germans were housed in this canal, and while there they were entirely free from bombardment and artillery of every kind. This tunnel was built in the time of Napoleon and became a part of the Hindenburg line. This tunnel was finally captured from the Germans, the Americans taking the northern end and the British the southern.

At Ypres an English officer told me that the inventor of the tank stated to him that he got his idea of the tank from seeing a tractor which was made in Peoria and a thrashing machine which was manufactured in Stockton, Cal. From the ideas suggested in these two he made the tank. It was, however, the little tractors, made by the thousands by Louis Renault, that did the most effective work.

My conducting officer, Capt. Warwick, told me that he asked Lord Reading who he thought was the best orator in America, to which Lord Reading replied without hesitation, "President Wilson." The captain then asked him if President Wilson's speeches were as good to listen to as they were to read, to which Lord Reading said, "No; but either way it left a person on a higher plane of thought thereafter."

Clemenceau is generally credited in France with accomplishing the unity of command which put Marshal Foch in charge of the allied armies. The story goes that Lloyd George suggested Douglas Haig, whereupon Clemenceau threatened to open up negotiations for peace if Foch was not put in command. Other gossip was to the effect that Lord Reading told President Wilson that they must have troops or quit in the early stages of America's entry into the war, and that President Wilson said without hesitation, "We will send all the troops that you will provide transportation for."

Lord Reading considered the deportation of women by the Germans as constituting the blackest pages of modern history.

I believe that all our special-service organizations, including the Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, Knights of Columbus, Salvation Army, and Jewish Welfare, should be handled by the Army. Now that the armistice has been signed, they have plenty of time to handle it themselves. They know its requirements better than anybody else and it will keep them busy. I have talked with members of these organizations and they invariably agree that the Army can handle it better.

When the Germans started through Belgium Gen. Pau was offered command of the French Army, but he said he must decline while there was an abler man in France, referring to Joffre. Joffre was then appointed, he in turn appointing Castelnau as chief of staff and Foch as field commander.

I might be pardoned for mentioning that I have heard as many accounts of the reasons for the winning of the Battle of the Marne as there have been Frenchmen that I have talked to. When the Germans lost the Battle of the Marne Von Moltke, the German commander in chief, is reported to have said to the Kaiser that victory was impossible; that a draw was the best that could be hoped for; whereupon the Kaiser appointed Falkenheim commander in chief, and after Falkenheim Von Hindenburg, who received his military teaching from the school of Frederick the Great. Ludendorf, who later became the real commander in chief, was a colonel at the time of the Boxer insurrection in China, but he went to the German minister there and had such a grasp of the situation and was of so much service to the German interests there that when the minister returned to Germany he took Ludendorf back with him, where he was given an important position. Ludendorf's downfall was generally accredited to his political ambitions.

Gen. Pershing is considered an able executive, but Gen. Liggett is generally considered by the French to be America's greatest field general.

It was said at British headquarters that on November 11, the date of the armistice, the British had a map showing the exact location of every division of the entire German Army.

One problem of reconstruction that faces the French of today is the fact that the agricultural districts of France are divided into little farms, which fact makes it rather difficult for the farmers to use tractors and other implements that would make for an economical production of foodstuffs. The English problem in connection with this is just the opposite, for in England a few men, comparatively speaking, own all the land.

On the Aisne front I secured a German machine gun which was brought down by the French pilot Pierre. The German gunner was killed and the German pilot burned.

I dined at the American mess at Chaumont and outside of Verdun and with the British Tommies at Ypres, and was the guest of Gen. McNear at Souilly. One of the most interesting phases of the ovations given in Paris to the rulers of other countries, including President Wilson, the King of Belgium, King of England, and the King of Italy, was the mad enthusiasm of the crowds, after the distinguished visitors had passed, for the poilus, who are the idols of the French people. The French women present them with flowers, the children take them by the hand, and evidence is given in every possible way of the gratitude the French people feel for these men who for four and one-half years have been battling in their defense.

The ruins of northern France are beyond description. The area of devastation in Belgium as compared with that of France is as 1 to 75. Cities like Albert, Lille, Baupaume, La Basse, and Ypres are entirely shot to pieces, and the cost of restoring them must include the removal of what is left. There is no such thing as rebuilding them or utilizing the ruins in any way. In Lille, Turcoing, and Roubaix, which are cities comprising a large manufacturing district in France, the factories were visited and the Germans had removed every piece of copper and brass, including the machine parts of brass and copper.

Americans in France are in danger of wearing their welcome out. The French people on innumerable occasions have told me they were glad the Americans came, for they appreciate fully what they did, but they would be glad to see them go home. Two million Americans stationed in France increase the cost of living for the French, make food scarce, and after four and one-half years of struggle which France has been through, and which has left her well-nigh prostrate, the presence of foreigners is more of a hindrance than a help. The Americans spend money so lavishly that the tradesmen are encouraged to ask exorbitant prices and neglect their French customers for the foreign trade, who buy regardless of the price.

It would be impossible for me to overemphasize the desire of the American boys to come home, and in the very early days of my trip, when the war was just over, there was one question, which was always this, "When are we going home?" I recall a San Antonio boy who said with the utmost confidence that if he could get a rowboat he would do the rest.

The General Staff, to the disgust of our entire Army, does not seem to be capable of coping with the difficulty. The result is this, and the American people ought to know it: The Army is sore—disgusted. They feel that the American soldier was made a great hero of and reassured in every possible way when they wanted him to enter the service, but after the armistice was signed he was, practically speaking, ignored. They believe that there is a "nigger in the woodpile" somewhere. But one thing is sure: If the American Expeditionary Force were to say in concert what they say in private over and over again, and to every person whom they believe to have any influence, there would reach America one mighty shout of "I want to go home."

Washington should cooperate with Gen. Pershing in getting the forces home. Instead of this, steamers are returning every week that could well take anywhere from two to five thousand more passengers. If the administration does not want to bring the soldiers home for any reason, they should say so. If they want to bring them home gradually, they should say so. If they want to bring them home as rapidly as possible, then they should announce the plan and reassure the men as to just how this is to be done. Instead of that, the men know they are not coming home as rapidly as they could. They know that, whatever the plan is, it has not been told them, and naturally they are suspicious of it. My opinion is that they have not any plan at all, but that it is just a hit-or-miss arrangement.

On the Lorraine, the steamer on which I returned, 500 or 1,000 soldiers in addition to those returning might have been given accommodation.

When it comes to staff work and generalship it must be admitted that our allies have not much respect for American generalship or strategy or technical knowledge. Everybody agrees that the American soldier is the finest in the world.

American officers boast that they studied French methods and ways upon their arrival in Europe, and then decided to do things their own way. French officers are very careful of the lives of their men. Frenchmen were never sent over the top without a most careful artillery preparation and a barrage; but American troops in some instances were ordered over with hardly any artillery preparation and no barrage at all. The result is that our casualties were unnecessarily high. That is universally agreed to.

I have talked with aviators who have been credited with five or six German planes, when they admit privately they only brought down one or two. I was told on numerous occasions that it was generally understood that the figures were to be padded. If an aviator came in and said he had brought down a plane he had no trouble in having it verified. This condition prevailed, according to testimony, after October 20. Prior to October 20, when the finish of the war was not in sight, airplane losses had to be confirmed by at least three witnesses. After that time the aviators stated to me the lid was off. Planes and new men were rushed up and the effort was obvious and admitted that the Army was out to pad the records.

I called on Gen. Patrick in Paris and was told by the general of the marvelous accomplishments of the American air forces. I was told how one squadron brought down more than 65 planes and lost less than 10 men; that between two and two and a quarter German planes were brought down for every American plane that was lost. At the front, however, I found facts entirely to the contrary. At the front I learned that the United States had not built and delivered for use against the enemy a single chase plane, or, in fact, a single seater, which planes are called by the English "pursuit" planes. On three separate and distinct occasions the Ninety-sixth Squadron of aviators and airplanes was completely wiped out. On the first occasion a Maj. Brown, with 6 machines and 12 men, flew over the German lines and surrendered. The Germans wrote back a note to the Americans, thanking them for the machines and the men, and inquiring, "What the hell will we do with the major?"

The postal service for the soldiers has been wretched beyond description. I have talked with innumerable soldiers who have never received a letter since they have been in France. As a general proposition, it takes a man three months to write home and get a reply. The postal service our soldiers have received in comparison with that given by the Canadian and British authorities is very wretched. The Army officers and men are disgusted with the lack of consideration that has been given them since the armistice has been signed. First, they believe that it was an act of base ingratitude to deny the right of any man to have a promotion after the armistice had been signed. They believe that a man who fought bravely and made sacrifices and had been recommended for a promotion should receive that promotion to which he was entitled, and that the mere fact of the war being over should not excuse the American Government from giving the reward which had been so justly earned. Secondly, the whole Expeditionary Force is in arms over the lack of ability on the part of the authorities to produce a plan for getting them home. They are aware of the friction that exists between the Expeditionary Forces and the authorities in Washington. They know of the promotions recommended by Pershing, which were added to by the Secretary of War. They know that when Pershing sent home his list of promotions to major general that the Secretary added to this list, and they know that when this knowledge came back to Pershing he ordered these men home. They also know of American officers who made bad "bulls" on the other side and were sent home by Pershing, only to be promoted shortly after their return by the Secretary of War. In fact, it is generally agreed in France that one way to be promoted in America is to be demoted there. All of these matters the rank and file of the Army believe are the cause of the present confusion in getting them home. They believe that the authorities in Washington are perfectly satisfied to indulge in the good old-fashioned game of "passing the buck."

Before I had been on French soil a week I heard so much and saw so much which was strange and new that I felt like a farmer on his first visit to a city.

Take camouflage, for example.

Though there is scarcely a word in the language which has been more used (and misused) since we first heard it during the early days of the war, I found, upon talking with the camofleurs themselves, that, to make use of an English colloquialism, we had been largely "fed up" on misinformation. Though scores of camouflage stories have been published in our newspapers and magazines, I discovered that of the real work of the Camouflage Corps the public in America was permitted to know next to nothing. Certain of the camouflage operations on our front were of such vital importance that it was necessary to envelop them in the deepest mystery.

When the war ended the American Camouflage Corps consisted of a battalion of engineers, which was on the point of being expanded to a regiment, under the command of Maj. Evarts Tracy, one of the foremost of American architects.

WIRE, BURLAP, AND FISH NETS.

Figures are, as a rule, dry reading, but they provide the best means I know of giving some idea of the magnitude of the operations of our Camouflage Corps. During the summer of 1918 the battalion used materials per month in the following quantities:

Four million three hundred and twenty-eight thousand square yards of burlap.

Two hundred thousand gallons of paint.

Seven thousand seven hundred fish nets.

Fifty thousand pounds of wire.

Two million one hundred and sixty thousand square yards of poultry netting.

These figures will suffice to give you some idea of the importance attached to camouflage in the Army.

So important, indeed, was camouflage regarded by the German high command that during the last year of the war there was attached to every German division a "security officer," whose duty it was to enforce the rigid observance of camouflage discipline by the various units of the division to which he was attached.

In many instances these security officers watched their respective divisions from observation balloons. They were answerable only to great headquarters, and were empowered, I understand, to recommend the removal of even divisional commanders for disregarding the rules for camouflage discipline laid down by Ludendorff.

Camouflage, it should be kept in mind, is of two kinds: Negative and positive. Negative camouflage consists in the concealment of troops, trenches, mine shafts, battery positions, ammunition dumps, hangars, and other objects whose location it is necessary to hide from the enemy.

Positive camouflage, on the contrary, consists in the imitation or suggestion of troops, trenches, batteries, etc., in certain locations, when in reality there was nothing of the sort there. This deceives and bewilders the enemy.

FOOLING POOR FRITZ.

It occasionally became necessary, for example, to convince the Germans that a large troop movement was in progress behind a certain sector of the front, whereas the real movement was taking place scores of miles away. If it was desired to suggest a movement by rail, smoke pots with clouds of dense black smoke belching from them were placed on flat cars and moved about from point to point on the military railways. German aviators, observing these columns of smoke at numerous points along the railways, naturally assumed that they came from locomotives hauling troop-laden trains, and promptly reported that large bodies of troops were apparently being moved by rail behind the American lines.

Thereupon the German commander would rush up his reserves to resist the attack which he believed to be impending.

Or if it was desired to imitate a troop movement by road the camouflage officer would requisition large numbers of Fords, which would be driven madly along the roads, dragging bundles of brush behind them. The great clouds of dust which thus suddenly appeared on the highways convinced the German aerial observers that the verdammte Yankees were rushing large bodies of troops to the front by bus or motor truck. Fooling Fritz was an amusing and an exciting game while it lasted.

PHOTOGRAPHS THAT LIED.

I might say that the Americans won battles on the western front because they were able to anticipate the German plans as a result of aviation photographs, which disclosed the fact that trains were bringing troops and supplies up to a certain point preparatory to an attack. To simplify the work of the aviators maps were furnished them illustrating the country and all its fortifications, artillery locations, and so forth, as of the day before. The work of the aviator was to note any change on the map.

It has frequently been said that the camera does not lie, but such assertions did not hold good after the Camouflage Corps commenced its operations. Thereafter the negatives brought in by the German airmen began to prove so unreliable that the officers whose business it was to interpret them never knew whether they were telling the truth or not.

For example, it frequently became necessary after heavy bombardments, in which long stretches of our entanglements had been destroyed, to convince the enemy that the wire had been repaired. This illusion was accomplished by the simple stratagem of driving stakes into the ground and festooning them with fish nets (hence the 7,700 fish nets used monthly by the Camouflage Corps), for, in a photograph taken from the sky, fish nets thus arranged are indistinguishable from wire. If such ruses are to deceive the enemy, however, as much attention must be paid to detail in their execution as David Belasco pays to detail in the production of a play.

On a certain British sector a not overintelligent subaltern was ordered by his battalion commander to take a working party and put out some 500 yards of this imitation wire, as there was reason to believe that the Huns, thinking the sector unprotected by entanglements, were preparing to make an attack. Now it is some job, even for a large and well-trained working party, to put out 500 yards of wire in much under a day. Heedless of such minor details, however, the lieutenant gaily slammed in his stakes and spread his fish nets as fast as his men could work, "wiring" the 500 yards of front in little more than an hour. From high in the blue the German airmen photographed the proceeding.

When one set of photographs showed a sector destitute of wire and another set of pictures, taken an hour later, showed the same area with a complete set of wire entanglements, the suspicions of Von Hindenburg's intelligence officers naturally were aroused, and the next morning at dawn the Germans launched the attack. In camouflage work, one can't afford to be slipshod.

The most elaborate camouflage works can be rendered utterly useless, moreover, by the carelessness of a single soldier, for there is little that escapes the eye of the airmen's camera, particularly when it is fitted, as during the latter days of the war, with a stereoscopic attachment.

It was told that in one of the sectors in Champagne the Germans had installed a battery of heavy guns which were so ingeniously concealed that we were unable to locate them. It was believed that they were hidden somewhere in a fringe of woods along a stream; but, though there was a considerable area of cultivated land beyond the woods, the aero photographs of it showed nothing which would suggest a path such as would be made by artillerymen going to and from their guns. One day, however, a new batch of plates, upon being developed, showed a tiny row of dots, no larger than pin points, stretching across this cultivated zone.

Upon studying an enlargement of the picture the intelligence officers became convinced that the line of pin points was really the trail left by a soldier crossing the field. And they led straight to a small wood on the bank of the stream, within which a battery might easily be hidden.

Working on this surmise, the American gunners registered on that particular patch of woods the following morning, whereupon the fire from the concealed battery abruptly ceased. German prisoners captured a few days later explained how the secret of the battery's position had been kept so long. The German security officer had issued orders that the artillerymen must under no consideration walk across the fields in order to reach their guns, but that they must instead follow a much-used highroad until they reached a bridge over the stream, drop from the bridge into the water, and wade up the stream until opposite their position. But one night, an artilleryman, in a hurry to reach his battery, and confident that the tracks left by a single man could do no harm, took a chance and a short cut across the forbidden field.

I have told you what happened to his battery as a result of his carelessness. Knowing something of German discipline, I can imagine what happened to him.

BISCUIT LIDS COVER TRACKS.

But it was not often that the Germans were caught napping, and so ingenious were some of their stratagems and ruses that it required an intelligence officer with the imagination and deductive powers of a Sherlock Holmes to keep up with them.

During the operations last summer on the Flanders front a British aviator brought in some photographs of a certain area behind the German lines. The intelligence officer whose duty it was to scrutinize them detected on the prints a suspicious something, which, he was convinced, was a cleverly camouflaged German battery, but, though it was in the midst of open country, there was no suggestion of a path leading to it. After studying the photographs under a magnifying glass for several hours, he suddenly exclaimed:

"I have it! They get up to the guns on the covers of biscuit boxes."

"What do you mean?" his chief asked, curiously.

"It's as plain as the nose on your face, sir," explained the youngster. "The boche knows jolly well that if he walked across that open ground his tracks would show up in our air photos. So, when he wants to get up to his battery, he gets a couple of wooden biscuit-box covers and ties strings to them. He stands on one cover and throws the other ahead of him, then jumps to that and drags up the first cover by means of the string and repeats the operation. Deuced clever of the beggars, I call it."

And, as subsequent events proved, the intelligence officer was right in his deduction.

The demands of the armies frequently affected the peoples of far-off regions in the most extraordinary fashion. Last summer, for example, there was some danger of the women of Madagascar having to go naked because their only article of clothing was purchased in such extraordinary quantities by the American Camouflage Corps. The costume of a Malagasy woman consists of nothing more than a three-yard length of native-woven, earth-colored matting. It was discovered that this matting, when laid upon the ground, imitated a path, such as would be made by the feet of soldiers, to perfection. So, in order to bewilder and deceive the Germans, a veritable network of imitation paths was laid down behind the American lines, 10,000 miles of women's dress goods being imported for the purpose from Madagascar.

BURLAP WOODS AND FIELDS.

Should you feel like raising your eyes at these figures, let me remind you that the American Camouflage Section used more than four and one-quarter million square yards of burlap every month. This burlap, much of which was "slashed" after the fashion of foliage props in theaters, was dyed in a great variety of colors, all of which were standardized and could be ordered by number. There were burlaps dyed and slashed to imitate plowed fields, grain fields, roads, lawns, quarries, water, rocks, and spring, summer, autumn, and winter foliage; in short, every phase of nature as found in eastern France.

By far the most important work of the camouflage section was the construction of "false contours" for the concealment of troops, gun positions, ammunition dumps, and the like. A "false contour" can best be described as the prolongation, by means of burlap spread over a sort of trellis made of poultry netting, of a ridge, promontory, or hill, the space beneath this burlap tent, which was dyed to the exact shade of the hill itself, providing perfect concealment for a battery or a battalion. So closely would nature be imitated in the shaping and coloring of these "false contours" that photographs taken by enemy flyers showed only an innocent hillside, with not enough vegetation to provide cover for a sniper.

THE DISILLUSIONED COW.

One of the "false contours," erected by the camouflage corps, was so cleverly executed that a peasant's cow, grazing on the hillside, strayed out onto the burlap surface, broke through, and was extricated only with considerable difficulty. When her pasture suddenly gave way I imagine that that cow had the surprise of her life.

Another development of the war, of which, for obvious reasons, nothing has been said in the press dispatches, was the silhouettes made of painted canvas, mounted on light wooden frames, which were used in the so-called "Chinese attacks"—an idea which we borrowed from the British. When it was necessary to ascertain how quickly the enemy could switch on his artillery fire in a certain sector, or the location of his batteries or machine guns, a hundred or more of these silhouettes, painted to represent American soldiers charging with fixed bayonets would be carried out into no man's land under cover of darkness and laid down in front of our wire in such a manner that they could be pulled upright by means of cords running back to our trenches.

Just at daybreak, at that hour when objects are still indistinct and when the nerves of the men are at the greatest tension, a signal would be given, the cords pulled, and a long line of what appeared to the startled Germans to be charging Yankees would suddenly appear in the mists overhanging no man's land.

Instantly the German trenches would crackle and blaze with musketry, the concealed batteries and machine-gun nests would betray their position by going into action, and by the time the Huns discovered the hoax which had been played upon them our observers had obtained the information which they desired. Sometimes, in order further to chagrin the boches, the silhouettes would be left standing.

PERISCOPE THROUGH BULLET HOLE.

Then there were soldiers' heads beautifully executed by skilled sculptors in papier-mâché. These were of great service in locating snipers. When a German sniper became particularly obnoxious and defied all attempts to locate him a papier-mâché head, crowned by a steel helmet, and made so as to move up and down in wooden guides, would be set up in that part of the trench which the sniper had been annoying.

At intervals the head would be slowly raised and lowered, so that from the outside of the trench it looked for all the world like a soldier peering cautiously over the parapet. Sooner or later the hidden marksman would send a bullet through the careless Yankee's brain. The neat hole drilled through the papier-mâché showed the exact direction from which the bullet came and by inserting in the hole a tiny telescope, no larger than a pencil, and looking through it by means of a periscope, the loophole from which the sniper was firing could be located—in one case such a loophole was cleverly concealed by an old boot apparently thrown carelessly onto the glacis, the sniper firing through a hole bored in its heel—and his occupation abruptly ended.

Though I have described at some length the use of these silhouettes and papier-mâché heads, because they are picturesque and interesting phases of modern war, it should be borne in mind that they were designed to meet exceptional conditions, that they were used infrequently, and that they were in no way typical of the enormously important work of the Camouflage Corps.

Just prior to the Argonne drive there was attached to the Army camouflage school at Langress, as instructor, a young machine-gun officer, Lieut. ———. Before the war he had been an osteopath, and applied, therefore, for a commission in the Medical Corps. The Army Medical Corps does not recognize osteopathy, however, and the commission was refused, whereupon the osteopath, determined to see action, applied for and obtained a commission in a machine-gun battalion.

But as his record card showed that he was a graduate of the Ecole des Beaux-Arts in Paris and had once been a painter he was detailed for duty as instructor in the Camouflage Section. The work of an instructor did not hold enough excitement for him, however, so when rumors reached him that the Americans were about to start an offensive in the Argonne he applied for a three days' leave.

Instead of spending his leave in Paris, as might have been expected, he succeeded in getting a ride on a motor truck which was bound for the front. He possessed no pass or papers of any kind, but he managed to evade the military police, and that night found him cosily ensconced in a dugout of the first line. How he got there without being arrested heaven only knows.

At daybreak the next morning the battalion with which our friend had spent the night went over the top, and, preceded by a fleet of "whippet" tanks, led the American advance against the German positions in the Forest of the Argonne.

RIGHT BEHIND TANK.

Right at the heels of one of the lumbering little tanks was our osteopath. He was not a very impressive figure or one likely to throw fear into the heart of a Hun, for he was considerably below medium height, though stockily built, with light, high-arched eyebrows, light, pompadour-cut hair, and a winning child-like smile, which combined to give him a peculiarly innocent expression. He started out armed with a stout walking stick and an automatic, but as it began to rain he buttoned his raincoat over his pistol; his stick he lost when he fell into a shell hole.

For perhaps a mile the line of tanks, followed by the straggling groups of infantrymen, pressed on, with never a shell or bullet to arrest them. Ascending a steep declivity, however, the advancing troops debouched upon a sort of plateau bordered by dense woods—the Forest of the Argonne.

"Then," as the osteopath put it, "all the machine guns in the German Army were turned loose on us." The atmosphere was filled with bullets. Before the Americans had advanced a hundred yards all but one of the tanks had been put out of action. A steel-jacketed bullet from an antitank rifle tore through the turret of the little whippet behind which the osteopath was sheltering himself and spatterd the interior with the gunner's brains.

Whereupon the machine, now defenseless, whirled like a frightened animal, its steel doors flew open, and the driver, dripping with his comrade's blood, emerged, and without ceremony started for the rear on a run. As for the little osteopath officer, he snuggled up against the abandoned tank, taking care to keep it between him and the German machine guns.

It happened that the tank had come to a halt within a few yards of a clump of trees, and from amid these trees there now emerged a German soldier, unarmed save for the bayonet which he still wore at his waist, and holding his hands above his head in the well-known "Kamerad" attitude.

But when he saw that the tank had been abandoned and that the only person in the immediate vicinity was an inoffensive looking and apparently unarmed American, his attitude underwent an instant change. Jerking loose his bayonet, he rushed with an angry roar on the American.

Now, my friend the osteopath had, as I have already remarked, lost his stick in a shell hole, and his pistol was underneath his buttoned raincoat. But he did not retreat a step. As his bulky enemy bore down on him the little osteopath snatched off his steel helmet and, holding it by the chin-strap so that it formed a gigantic boxing glove, drove it squarely into the oncoming Prussian's face, breaking his nose and shattering his teeth.

As the German halted, dazed by the force of the impact, the American was on him in a flash, and, wresting away his bayonet, drove it deep into his fleshy neck.

"I knew how to put it in where it would do the most good," the little officer explained modestly, "because, you see, having been an osteopath, I understand the human anatomy."

Now the osteopath, as he remarked afterwards, had gone up to the front for the sole purpose of getting some souvenirs to send the folks back home, and here was a whole heap of souvenirs lying only a few yards away. But, in order to reach them, he would have to leave the shelter of his tank and expose himself to a terrific machine-gun fire. But he had come out to get souvenirs and he was not the sort who balks at obstacles.

So, lying down, he dragged himself, foot by foot, out to the huddled body of the deceased German and proceeded to stock up with mementoes, cutting off the man's iron cross, his epaulettes, and even the buttons from his tunic. Then, with bulging pockets, he started for the rear, while machine-gun bullets kicked up spurts of earth all around him.

And this was the man of whom his commanding officer had once remarked: "An excellent officer, but inclined to lack force and initiative."

The question which I asked most frequently in France, and which has been asked me repeatedly since my return, was, "To what do you attribute the sudden collapse of the German war machine?" And, upon comparison of the various replies which I received, I think that the best answer would be, "Gas, the failure of the submarines, and conscription."

When Germany horrified the world—the civilized world, I mean—by her use of gas at Ypres in the spring of 1915, she little dreamed that she was sealing her own fate. How could she foresee that two years later almost to a day the United States would enter the war against her and that all the chemical resources of America would be turned to making a more deadly gas and far more of it than could be produced by the Huns? By the late autumn of 1917 the United States had built and had in operation the greatest poison-gas plant in existence—a plant with four times the production of all the German gas factories put together. It was the mustard gas from Edgewood Arsenal, on the shores of Chesapeake Bay, which helped decide the issue at Chateau-Thierry and in the Argonne. For whenever an area can be saturated with mustard gas, that area must be evacuated. And the Germans knew—which our own people did not—that when the armistice was signed we had at Edgewood, ready for shipment, 500 tons of mustard gas, with which we proposed to smother the defenses of Metz. And they likewise knew—though it had been kept a profound secret from our own people—that our chemical engineers had succeeded in perfecting a new and mysterious gas of incredible deadliness, against which there was no known method of defense. So before the Germans was the knowledge that sooner or later their armies would be exterminated by the very weapon which they had themselves invented, but which we, thanks to our inventiveness and our unlimited manufacturing resources, had made a thousand times more terrible than anything of which they had ever dreamed.

The second cause of the German debacle was the failure of her submarines to halt or even to retard the river of American soldiery which was flowing Europeward. The American scheme of protection against U-boats seemed well-nigh perfect, for every day brought secret messages to the German great headquarters of the safe arrival of Yankee transports, troop laden, at Bordeau, St. Nazaire, and Brest. The long arm of our Navy was like that of the prize fighter, Bob Fitzsimmons; no blow, no matter how cunning, could get past it. But we did not stop there, for our naval experts argued that to attack is the best defense. So, instead of the U-boats hunting our transports, our destroyers and chasers and seaplanes went out to hunt the U-boats. And, so far as the submarine campaign was concerned, that was the beginning of the end. They tell a story in France—it is only a story, of course, but it illustrates the amazement caused by the safe transport of the American forces across the Atlantic—of a group of officers, allied and German, who were brought together by the parleys which preceded the signing of the armistice. The talk turned on decorations, and, after some urging, a Frenchman told of the deed for which he had been awarded the war cross. An Englishmen modestly explained why his Government had bestowed on him the military cross. Finally the German described the exploit which had won for him the iron cross. "But," he added vehemently, "what I'd like to know is how in hell those Yankees got across."

Congress delivered a solar-plexus blow to Germany's hopes of winning the war when it passed the bill providing for the conscription of every able-bodied American between 18 and 45. The German general staff had admitted that, even in the face of the submarine menace, we might succeed in getting 200,000 men, even 300,000, across the Atlantic. But we sent a million, and after that another million. ("Untrained levies" the Germans called them.) Then Secretary Baker asked, in a ringing speech, "Why stop with an Army of 5,000,000?" And on top of that came the conscription act which would have brought to the colors 10,000,000, perhaps 15,000,000, fighting men. "It isn't an army," a German officer remarked bitterly. "It's a human avalanche. And you can't expect us to fight the forces of nature."

One of the most remarkable accomplishments of America in France, though one of the least known, was the establishment of the great educational system known as the Army Schools of the American Expeditionary Forces, which, when the armistice was signed, were being attended by more than 18,000 officers and men. When Gen. Pershing landed in France, in the spring of 1917, one of the most pressing problems which confronted him was the immediate organization of a system of higher education for officers in various branches of the staff and line. The training which the officers of our new armies had received at Plattsburg and similar training camps was excellent as far as it went, but it was, through force of circumstances and lack of time, of the most elementary character. It had, moreover, been almost wholly along American lines. The commander in chief quickly realized that his officers must be instructed in the methods used by the French and British, with whom they were to fight shoulder to shoulder. And though this was a war of specialists few, if any, of our officers had had the time or the opportunity to specialize. What, for example, did we know of gas warfare, of sapping and mining, of flash and sound ranging, of liaison and intelligence work, of pigeons, tanks, 37-millimeter guns, of transportation by road and rail under European conditions, and, most important of all, of the innumerable phases of staff work as developed by the great conflict? When we entered the war the American Army did not possess a staff manual or a staff handbook of its own. This lack of special knowledge had to be remedied, and remedied quickly, if our armies were to take the field in time to save the allied cause. There was no time to lose. A system of instruction had to be devised and put in operation whereby our officers could acquire in a few months the special knowledge which our allies had acquired in three years of warfare. Langres, a small French town about 20 miles south of Chaumont, which was the American general headquarters, was selected as the center of this "school area." Gen. Pershing did not let the grass grow under his feet when it came to establishing this training system, and in an amazingly short time there had been opened in or near Langres an intelligence school, a sanitary school, a signal school, an engineer school with pioneer, gas, flash, and sound ranging, bridge and mining sections, a school for Infantry specialists, a machine-gun school, a pigeon school, a searchlight school, a tank school, and a school for candidates, at which 6,000 enlisted men, the pick of the American Expeditionary Forces, were trained for commissions as second lieutenants. At the top of this educational pyramid was the School of the Line, where several hundred carefully selected officers were trained in the higher branches of tactics and combat work, and the General Staff College, where the principles of staff work were taught.

Now, there exists, I find, a general and not unnatural feeling that though this enforced training was likely to be a good thing for those who proposed to make the Army a profession it was for those citizen soldiers who propose to return to civil life so much wasted time so far as their civilian occupations were concerned. But I have become convinced that when we have had time to adjust ourselves to the unfamiliar sensation of a world at peace, we will find, among other unexpected things, that the time spent by our officers and men in the army schools of France was very far from being wasted. An officer who, at the General Staff College, learned how to move a division, consisting of 28,000 men, from Brest to Verdun, and provide them with food en route, will by the application of that same knowledge be able to transport tourists from Boston to California or commuters from the South Station to the Newtons and Wellesley. A man who has learned how to build bridges for the use of troops will be able to find employment in the West building bridges for the use of farmers. A man who has in France served as an officer of our military police, or as a provost marshal, or as a town major, will be able efficiently to guard the public safety of an American community. A man who has been trained to make decisions quickly where the lives of men are concerned should be able to display an equal soundness of judgment where dollars instead of lives are in the balance. I firmly believe that the enforced lessons of discipline, decision, administration, and leadership which our young men have learned in France can not fail to have a beneficent and constructive effect on all their future endeavors.

No one who is familiar with the work of the great Military Academy at West Point will deny that the young men who graduate from it are admirably trained for the business of fighting. It by no means follows, however, that the training which they received at the institution on the Hudson qualified them to supervise and direct those military activities which were, when all is said and done, primarily of an industrial character. Though the War Department had at its command the services of men who had spent their lives in the operation of transcontinental railways, who had built wharves and breakwaters and harbor works on every seaboard of the world, who had designed and manufactured engines of every description, who had directed mills and factories employing thousands of workmen, the responsibility for the construction and operation of our harbors, our railways, and our repair shops was not intrusted to these experts and specialists, as common sense should have dictated, but in every case of which I have knowledge they were made subordinate to a suddenly promoted officer of the Regular Establishment whose previous experience had consisted in fighting bandits on the border, in commanding a remote Army post in the Philippines, or in holding down a desk job in Washington. One of the high officials of the Pennsylvania system, a man with a lifetime's experience in railroading, was given a commission as brigadier general and, it was commonly understood in this country, was in virtual charge of the American railways in France. Yet it is a matter of common knowledge that he was so hectored and hampered by his inexperienced superiors that he was more than once on the point of tendering his resignation. A similar unfortunate state of affairs prevailed, I am reliably assured, during the construction of the great harbor works at Bordeaux, St. Nazaire, and Brest. It was only when failure was imminent, and their own ignorance and incompetence was in danger of exposure, that the Regulars permitted the specialists to have their way. As a result, it was the specialists who did the work and got the results; and West Pointers were specialists in fighting only.

To many of our higher officers, both at home and abroad, has been delegated undreamed-of power and authority. In their own provinces their word has been law—and rightly so. But the war is over now, and the dictatorial powers which they have exercised must end. It is not going to be easy for them to readjust their views and their mode of life. We shall never forget the services which they have rendered us in times of peril, but those services, valuable as they were, will never justify the establishment of anything approaching a military caste in a democracy such as ours. The War Department has, in the past 18 months, become accustomed to the careless spending of huge sums of public money. But, though the emergency which required these lavish expenditures is ended now, the spending still goes on, the War Department justifying itself by the argument that war contracts must be filled, regardless of whether we have any use for the material contracted for; that labor must be placated; that the national industries must not be disrupted by a sudden ending of the spending spree. But I imagine that the American taxpayers, with the largest budget in the history of the world staring them in the face, are quite willing to risk the consequences of an abrupt cessation of war expenditures.

The Secretary of the Treasury wants permission to issue ten billions more in bonds, and ten billions in notes. What a war it must have been. It is over, and the spring financing amounts to $20,000,000,000, on top of all the other billions, and with no end in sight. John Sherman once remarked, when the question of the resumption of specie payments was being discussed, "The way to resume is to resume." And I feel confident that the American people, laboring under an already enormous burden of taxation, will agree with me that the way to stop further military expenditures is to stop.

In France I saw the greatest aggregation of famous soldiers and statesmen ever assembled. On a journey no greater in distance than from Boston to Buffalo I saw representatives of half the armies of the world, still wearing their battered helmets and mud-stained uniforms. Within a two-hours' ride by motor from the French capital I saw a region which four years ago was a veritable garden of the Lord, but which looks to-day as though it had been devastated by a conflagration, an earthquake, a tidal wave, and a cyclone. I heard enough stories of adventure, romance, and peril to fill a dozen volumes, told me by the men who were themselves actors in them. And, to add to the interest, everyone was bursting to tell the "inside" stories of military exploits and historic events and diplomatic mysteries of which it was not safe to so much as whisper while the war was on.

One of the most interesting and least advertised developments of the war was the work of the flash and sound ranging section of the Engineer Corps. Flash ranging means the locating of an enemy gun by the detection of its flash. Sound ranging determines the direction and distance of a gun by its sound. Flash rangings were generally made at night by two or more observers stationed a known distance apart, these observers thus forming the extremities of an imaginary base line. Once the flashes of an enemy battery were "spotted," their magnetic direction could easily be determined by means of compasses. With the base line already known and the base angles thus obtained, a simple calculation in triangulation would determine the approximate location of the guns. So highly was flash reading developed by the Americans that a gun could be located within 5 yards when the "core" of its flash could be seen. Flash ranging was also used extensively in determining the accuracy of fire of our own guns. If, for example, an American battery was firing by the map at a hidden target, a shell would be timed so as to burst at the top of its trajectory, where it could be seen by our observers. If their readings showed the burst at the spot where, according to calculations, it should occur, the gunners knew that they had the correct range, and that their shells, if set with a longer fuse, would burst on the target.

Sound ranging was carried on by methods very similar to those used in flash ranging, except that the readings were made by microphones instead of by observers. The vibrations caused by the reports of the guns were recorded by the needle of the microphone in a series of zigzag lines on a moving strip of sensitized film. With these microphone records as a basis for calculations, it was frequently possible to locate a gun within 60 yards. I was told by British officers that, before the launching of the great assault which resulted in the capture of Messines Ridge, the location of practically every German battery was definitely determined by sound ranging.

Although, during my visit to the front, I was shown dugouts along the whole "Frontier of Freedom," from the North Sea to Switzerland, I had but a slight conception of the amazing nature of the warfare which our soldiers waged beneath the surface of the earth until I learned of the work of the American mining section. France and England early recognized the importance of mining warfare, and organized their miners accordingly, and the United States, upon her entry into the war, did the same, it being estimated that there were upward of 40,000 skilled miners on the western front when the armistice was signed. These soldiers of the pick and drill were brought from the remotest corners of the earth, from the Yukon, the Rand, and the Congo, from Mexico, Australia, and California. The officers of the section were engineers who had had practical experience in all those far-off regions where men seek their fortunes in the earth.

In former wars military mining was almost wholly confined to siege operations—that is, driving galleries under fortified positions and blowing them up. But the great war developed an entirely new system of mining tactics, which included frontal and flank attacks, raids, enveloping movements, and other phases of war as fought on the surface of the earth. "Unlike the soldier who fights above ground," explained an officer of the mining section, "the miner has to be prepared for attacks not only against his front and flanks, but against assaults which may come from overhead or underneath. In other words, he has four flanks instead of two to defend."

A typical mining position, such as would be prepared on an active sector of the front, would consist of an upper level having a series of forked galleries, known as "feelers," with geophone listening posts at their extremities, and a deeper level with numerous "fighting branches" to protect the lower flank. Just as the sentries in the trenches strain their eyes in the darkness to detect any ominous figures in no man's land, so the mining sentinels, crouching over their geophones in the headings of dimlit galleries, strained their ears to catch the faint sounds which gave warning that the enemy was approaching underground. The geophone, which has proved of incalculable value in mining warfare, is an instrument for augmenting small sounds coming through the earth. It has various forms, but in most of them one piece of charcoal is held loosely between two other pieces in such a manner as to be affected by the slightest vibrations conveyed to it by the earth. Connected with these two external pieces is a telephone receiver. When this is placed to the ear the sounds caused by a fly walking on the wooden support of the geophone appear as loud as the tramp of a horse on a stable floor. If a sentinel on duty in an underground listening post catches through his geophone a sound which is more distinct in, say, his right ear than in his left, he gently shifts the instrument, inch by inch, until the sound is the same in both ears. Then by means of a compass he gets the magnetic bearing of the direction in which he is facing, which is the direction from which the sound comes. Meanwhile sentries in other listening posts are doing the same thing, so that by the coordination of their reports and by a simple problem in triangulation the enemy's gallery can be located within a few yards.

If the mining officer was convinced that the enemy was driving a gallery for the purpose of putting a mine under our position, two courses of action were open to him. He could remain on the defensive and check the enemy's advance by the use of "camouflets," this being the name applied to explosive charges which expend their force laterally, thus destroying the enemy's gallery without causing a crater, or he could resort to strategy and engage the enemy's attention at one point by exploding camouflets or by working noisily, and, under cover of this diversion, drive a fighting gallery toward the enemy's flank elsewhere. In this latter case the most profound silence had to be observed in the fighting branch if the enemy's geophones were not to give warning of its approach. No talking would be permitted, the men would wear felt-soled shoes and work with trowels instead of picks, and the earth would be carried out in cars with rubber tires. So silently would the operations in a fighting branch be conducted that it would break into the enemy gallery without the slightest warning, whereupon would ensue so strange and desperate a battle that it would seem like the creation of a novelist's brain—a conflict waged scores of feet beneath the surface of the earth, by combatants armed with pistols, picks, bombs, and knives, and illuminated only by the flickering light of miner's lamps.

One of the essentials for the success of a mining operation was the concealment of the spoil—that is, the excavated earth—which, if piled in a heap at the entrance to the workings, would be photographed by the German airmen, thus informing the enemy, as unmistakably as though it were announced on a placard, that a mining gallery was being driven. The French, in order to hide the spoil from their mining operations, conceived the ingenious plan of digging a shallow trench, usually only a few inches deep, and lining it with black paper, so that, when photographed from an airplane, it produced the effect of the black shadow cast by a trench of customary depth. They would then distribute the spoil from their subterranean galleries along the sides of this false trench, so that it appeared in the photograph to have been thrown up from it.

Dugouts have become such a commonplace in the past four years that few, save the miners themselves, gave much thought to or had more than the haziest ideas of the time, skill, and labor required in their construction. Take yourself, for example. You have read about dugouts and have seen pictures of dugouts and have probably had relatives or friends living in dugouts. How long, then, think you, would it take a force of skilled miners to complete a front-line dugout large enough to accommodate a half platoon? For your information, I might explain that such a dugout is 35 feet long, 9 feet wide, and 6 feet high, with 17 feet of overhead cover. Using all the men that could be employed, and working from nightfall until dawn, to complete such a dugout would require at least three months. If in the rear area, where the men could be worked continuously in shifts, it could be completed in 30 days. I mention these facts in order that you may realize the incredible labor which was required to provide shelter for the millions of men fighting on the western front. The same labor, could it have been applied to the pursuits of peace, would have built a dozen Panama Canals, a score of transcontinental railways, a hundred good-sized cities.

A recent development of trench warfare, and one of which you probably have not heard, was the introduction of "mobile charges." These consisted of packages of high explosive in 10, 20, and 30 pound sizes which were used by assaulting troops for destroying dugouts, much as depth bombs were used by the Navy to destroy submarines. With the increasing use of these mobile charges it became necessary to design dugouts which would be proof against them. In this work, which was carried on by the mining section, extensive use was made of dogs, experiments having shown that explosions which will rupture the lung tissues of a dog will similarly affect those of a human being. Thanks to the knowledge thus obtained at the cost of canine lives, a type of dugout construction was perfected which afforded the occupants comparative immunity from mobile charges and hand grenades. An ingenious receptacle for this latter form of enemy visiting card was a "bomb pit," which was a sort of small cistern built at the foot of the dugout stairs, into which a hand grenade would fall and explode harmlessly.

Speaking of dogs, a considerable use was made of Airedales, police dogs, and certain other breeds having a high order of intelligence for carrying messages, for detecting the approach of enemy patrols, and for discovering wounded men in no man's land. Very extensive use was also made of pigeons. I have been told that of all the messages instrusted to pigeons by the allied armies during the four years of the war 96 per cent were delivered. They tell the story of an American doughboy, who, before he donned khaki, was a very tough citizen of New York's east end. To him during his battalion's advance was intrusted a hamper filled with messenger pigeons, which he carried on his back. In some manner he became detached from his command and was lost in no man's land, where he was discovered that night by an officer crouching in a shell crater.

"What's that thing you've got on your back?" inquired the officer, not recognizing the pigeon hamper in the darkness.

"They're boids, Cap, boids," explained the former Boweryite in a hoarse whisper. "And dat ain't de woist of it, for I hear they's goin' to give us dawgs."

In these days of materialism it is desirable by way of inspiration to make more than passing note of the wonderful acts of bravery and courage which are well-nigh daily occurrences. Right does, indeed, make might. Perhaps momentarily the act of expediency seems to win, but in the long run, sooner or later, by and large, if one does the right thing one succeeds. Virtue is its own reward. If you cut the corner of honesty and integrity you lose; your sins will find you out. Germany had success figured out as a mathematical proposition. They left out of the reckoning those intangible qualities without which life would not be worth living—honesty, honor, justice, virtue, the God of battles. What was it that made victory on innumerable occasions just elude the Germans? Numerous instances have been related to me of opportunities unimproved which would have given Germany victory. It just did not happen. What kept the Germans from taking Paris in the initial rush? In view of Germany's marvelously sustained effort in all theaters of action it is a difficult thing to explain. We have at lenst progressed to that point where we recognize that a mysterious thing called morale is one of the most essential elements that create victory. Could it be possible that the Good Book holds the key to the situation, when it says God works in mysterious ways his wonders to perform? Belgium hung onto the Germans three days, just long enough to allow the French to get ready. France just barely held on till England came to the rescue. Italy was saved by a hair, and America arrived just in time to save the allies from certain defeat. Have the days of miracles, indeed, passed? Will all-wise college professors explain all these things away and rob them of their spiritual significance, as they have attempted on so many occasions to do of the miracles of olden time? Sometimes I am fearful of sending my boy to college for fear of the atheism and all-wise self-sufficiency of our present-day methods. What we need to-day in the tangled condition of the world's affairs is the simple faith of Abraham Lincoln.

Kind hearts are more than coronets and simple faith than Norman blood.

The tendency of the age is hero worship, and we jump from crag to crag, like the nimble chamois. False prophets with cure-alls sell their panaceas for various ills. For the moment we have the military bug. Spending the public moneys like a drunken sailor is a passion among the politicians. These vast expenditures should be stopped. The administration, in its extravagant expenditures, started something, as did the Kaiser, that they have not the ability to stop. I am reminded of Seward's famous remark in regard to the question of resuming specie payment at the close of the Civil War. He said the way to resume is to resume, and so I believe the way for America to get back to the simple life of economy and efficiency in our national affairs is to make a start. Stop spending money. Encourage business. Do not antagonize it. Strangle these politicians who cater to men's passions and prejudices rather than to their hearts and consciences. Adopt the rule that Gladstone insisted upon in his home, namely, "Do not criticize unless you have something better to suggest." It is not a crime to succeed. All successful men are not crooks. The question should not be how much have you got, but how did you get it. A year ago the administration frowned on a contemplated American loan to China; within a year thereafter we made a new treaty with Japan, when we agreed, in substance, to close one eye, when peace at any price was our national slogan, while Japan emasculated China. It costs $30,000,000 a day to conduct war, yet we undertake to run our Diplomatic Service at a cost of $1,500,000 per annum. What is the result? Unless a man has a fortune, he can not enter the Diplomatic Service, and while we may entertain the prevalent fancy that brains just naturally gravitate to the seat of our national affairs at Washington, it is difficult to believe that diplomats with brains instead of social ambition are going to work for a salary that will not pay their living expenses. At the present time a list of the campaign contributions to the preceding presidential election is a pretty sure index of the names of those to be nominated for the Diplomatic Service. Then, again, there is a popular notion that our representatives in foreign countries are to be great entertainers and heroes of the ballroom, and that it would be reprehensible for our Diplomatic Service to be interested in expanding our commerce and trade, yet one can readily see that the expansion of our foreign trade brings increased production to our factories and work for our citizens. What is the Government for—to restrict business or to expand it; to increase the wealth of the country or to devise methods of restricting it; to make prosperity or to play politics? Is it an occupation for theorists and jacks-of-all-trades, or is it an occupation where accomplishment is a recommendation? We Americans need to get down to brass tacks and to eliminate lost motion and empty phrases, and to admit that brains can be utilized even in America's political affairs. There is no Svengali method by which the Government can compel business to increase wages without increasing prices. It can not be done. We have tried it once; it did not work. Chaos is the result. Let us get back to first principles and cut out the soft stuff. Get the boys back here as soon as possible, remove all poster appeals for war loans and illustrated stories of atrocities, and settle down to paying the bills, which is going to be some undertaking in itself.

We should all stand back of President Wilson in his efforts for world peace, because despite the obvious inability of newspaper correspondents in Paris to obtain or transmit all the truth, one fact at least is perfectly clear, namely, the determination on the part of our allies not to yield the fruits of victory for the sake of creating a league of nations. If the peace of the world is to be insured, now is the accepted time, the peace conference is the place, and the American people are the only ones with whom this thought is dominant.

As a matter of fact, the rank and file of the French people do not comprehend what the word "liberty" means—in the sense that we use and know it in America. The ruling class over there have the mass of the people tied up as snug as a bug in a rug. A French employer is really worried if his employee shows signs of prosperity, such as having a graphophone. They say when a man wants to break into politics in France he starts as a radical, but eventually, being "amenable to reason," he becomes a conservative. The cities of France, especially Paris, live on the rest of the country, and the contrast in living conditions is marked. The men of money and influence are slow to loosen up, and the Government is so far removed from the people—the deputies elect the President—that the interest of the employer in his employee is not stimulated by legislation such as we put on the statute books from time to time. That is one reason why the French die faster than they are born. They can not afford to have children.

Somebody asked me on my return to America what difference you noticed as you crossed the line from France into Germany.

My answer was, the greatest contrast I noted upon crossing the line was the presence in Germany of children—kids, youngsters everywhere. As I rode from Strassburg to Metz, through that beautiful territory which was a part of Alsace and Lorraine which Germany had lost forever, I wondered how the French were going to populate and utilize this territory. Perhaps the higher ups will have to step down a bit and extend the hand of relief to the lower downs. At least that is the one best way that occurs to me.

There are countless other things which I might mention, did space and time permit, of my pilgrimage along that zigzag stretch of mud and blood known as the western front.

But the recollection which remains the clearest and the brightest in my memory, when all is said and done, is not of the great French marshal, nor of the glittering pageants, nor the streams of prisoners, nor the shell-torn cathedrals, nor the avenues of captured cannons, but, rather, of the American boys—boys from Boston and New York and Philadelphia, from Seattle and San Francisco and San Diego, and from all the cities and towns and hamlets in between—the boys who have offered everything they had to offer that you and I, my friends, might live in security and peace. I saw them, these fellow countrymen of ours, in many places and under many conditions; I saw them in camps and hospitals and barracks, in mud and snow and rain; no matter where I saw them, no matter how plainly I read in their eyes that they were sick with longing for the homeland, they were always cheerful, courageous, and uncomplaining. No wonder that despite all the mistakes of our generals and the blunders of our military system here at home, these clean-cut, clean-minded, smiling boys have won for America the respect and affection of her allies. After seeing our soldiers in the field, I am prouder than ever to call myself an American. God bless 'em!

The Irish Resolution Will Hurt and Not Help the Hopes of Ireland.

OF
HON. RICHARD WAYNE PARKER, OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919,

On a motion to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the earnest hope of the Congress of the United States of America that the peace conference now sitting in Paris in passing upon the rights of various peoples will favorably consider the claims of Ireland to the right of self-determination."

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Under general leave granted to Members of the House to extend their remarks upon the foregoing resolution, I submit the following:

Mr. Speaker, no greater injury can be done to Irish aspirations than by the passage of this resolution.

No one who considers the subject can fail to agree that except for interference of other nations Ireland would have kept her parliament or would have been granted at least as much autonomy as belongs to Canada and Australia, who can protect their own manufactures and production, develop their own industries, and were not left for centuries, as Ireland was, to be a poor farming country inhabited, except in one or two towns only, by poor peasants and absentee proprietors. I am not making a talk about the tariff, but my old friend, Dominie Robinson, used to say, "If anyone wants to see the effects of free trade in a farming country, let him immigrate to Ireland."

Ireland's miseries for the last 300 years seem to have come directly or indirectly from foreign interference. A Spanish invasion brought on the cruel devastations of the age of Queen Elizabeth; French invasions had much to do with similar savage warfare in the time of Cromwell and James the Second; French intrigues in the beginning of the nineteenth century were perhaps responsible for the abolition of the Irish Parliament; and German intrigues throughout the last great war caused a feeling that both parties in Ireland were under arms. A grant of self-government would probably have been made in spite of the resistance of Ulster if England had not feared that Ireland would become a German military base.

Resolutions of sympathy only do harm unless they are backed up by force. When the United States passed such resolutions as to Poland in Kosciusko, Hungary in Kossuth, the Armenians in Turkey, and the Jews in Russia it simply aggravated conditions by incensing the rulers. The South American Colonies were not freed by American resolutions of sympathy, because Spanish power had been broken down by the invasions of Napoleon and by internal strife. Cuba was not freed by our declaration as to Cuban belligerency, except so far as that declaration angered Spanish sympathizers and brought on the destruction of the Maine and the war in which our Army and Navy freed Cuba.

This resolution is no mere resolution of sympathy. It asks that the peace conference, in passing on the rights of various peoples, should consider the claims of Ireland as a right. This peace conference is the most important body in the world. It is called under an armistice to settle a peace with Germany, and it has no other function except to obtain guaranties and indemnities which will make that peace secure. Incidentally, however, it has to reestablish government in the parts of Europe where all civil order has been destroyed by the war. These regions include a broad belt of country extending from the Baltic through Poland, Galicia, the Balkans, Constantinople, Roumania, Persia, Palestine, and the Valley of the Euphrates to the Persian Gulf. The peace conference will settle these boundaries and governments not because of a desire so to do but because it is a necessity of the war. We had to do the same thing in Cuba, holding elections by military authority. We did the same thing in Porto Rico. It caused us a very nasty little war to do it in the Philippines, but we regarded these countries as being in our hands as a sacred trust and that our military possession placed the duty upon us of providing orderly government. Perhaps the allies ought to have taken possession of the whole of Germany for the purpose of doing this work.

Perhaps if they had done so there would be better prospects now that our boys would come home soon. But surely these problems are great enough without endeavoring to add to them questions as to other countries over which the peace conference has no jurisdiction whatever because they did not come within the field of warfare.

This resolution can do nothing but harm. Proud nations do not brook interference. I remember when we were ready to fight England during the Civil War unless she held her hand, and she stayed it. We all remember that we would hardly have taken the Philippines except for the threats of the German Navy against Admiral Dewey.

One other question, however, that I want to put is, What is likely to occur at the peace table by reason of this resolution? Will England submit the claims of Ireland to the decision of other nations? Will she regard our action as a sympathetic endeavor to stir up further warfare and bloodshed in Ireland? I am not much in favor of a league that is a permanent supernational government. I ask those who do favor it whether England will wish to go into a league if it is to have power over such questions, and could certainly claim power over the Suez Canal, Gibraltar, and India, as well as over the rights of Mexico in territory that we have taken from her? It is not a mere matter of principle, but of practical sense. It may well be questioned whether we desire at this time to embarrass the peace table, on whose successful and unanimous agreement it depends whether our boys can come home promptly and stay at home.

It should be confessed by all that Ireland is sure to have self-government. The land of Wesley and Wellington, Swift and Wolsey; the land that has given marshals to France and Russia, and which has furnished us our host of soldiers and statesmen, and produced her poets, orators, and her long line of patriots; that land will certainly be restored to the right of self-government, so that Great Britain and Ireland would live as sister States, united for the common defense and the general welfare, but independent, as all States ought to be, in local affairs, and especially in the development of their own strength and resources, mental and material. Settlement is sure if others do not interfere.

Diplomacy has learned much in modern days. It has learned to obey some of the ten commandments. It respects truth and other people's property much more than it used to, and it is also learning that there is one commandment as important as any—the eleventh commandant, "Mind your own business." The Good Book tells us that the peacemakers are blessed, but I think this means those who make and keep the peace themselves and not those who are always interfering in other people's disputes. We are at a peace table. Let all that we do be in order to make peace and not to promote further war.

The Presidential Primary.

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN,

OF MINNESOTA.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, "you are all acquainted with boss politics; bosses have often dictated presidential politics in the past. House file 36 is now a law. It strikes down the all-powerful boss and the people will now nominate their own candidates for President by direct primary vote at the polls. This bill was one of the three most important measures passed during the last session." This was my statement to the people of Minnesota in 1913 on the passage of the Minnesota presidential primary.

The Minnesota bill was based on the Wisconsin-Oregon laws. It was carefully scrutinized and gone over by some of the ablest men in Minnesota. It has stood the scrutiny of some of the ablest committees of three legislatures. The senate elections committee, after a most careful study, made certain amendments to the bill and then voted the same out unanimously.

The following appeared as leading newspaper articles in the Minneapolis press:

State supreme court upholds primary law. Every detail of it O. K., is the ruling as to constitutionality. Candidate for President must file before election is decision. The Minnesota presidential preference-primary law stands. It was upheld in its every section by the State supreme court yesterday. So ends the attempt to overthrow the new presidential preference-primary law.

Minnesota leads in Republican advance. Presidential primary makes difference in attitude toward national committee. Politicians say State's law will guide other States. General use of direct voting predicted by 1916. Minnesota is not going to get excited about anything which the Republican National Committee in session in Washington did. Had the national committee called a national convention, Minnesota would have remained in the same apparently apathetic mood. For, say the political students of this State, sooner or later the national Republican leaders must look to Minnesota to learn the road which leads to party unification. The presidential primary law, which went on the Minnesota statute books last winter, largely through the instrumentality of ERNEST LUNDEEN, its author, is the only road, say local Republican leaders, which can be followed.

Those who believe in the right of direct and effective control of the Government by the people favor a presidential primary law, just as they favor State-wide primary laws. Their influence has brought about the enactment of primary laws in and for a great majority of the States. This action of the people of the various States is a sure forerunner of what is coming nationally. If this Congress does not enact a presidential primary law, some future Congress will, and the Members of this Congress will live to regret their failure to furnish the people with the necessary machinery for taking the nomination of their presidential ticket out of the hands of corrupt bosses and placing it in the hands of the people themselves.

In a statement to the Minneapolis Daily News on February 24, 1916, I gave some facts and figures on the presidential primary law. I said then, and I repeat it now:

DISGRUNTLED BOSSES ATTACK THE PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARY.

Who are the enemies of the primary elections laws? A few there are who honestly oppose election reforms and believe thoroughly in the old boss-ruled conventions. The majority of opponents, however, are professional politicians, who spend most of their time in figuring out methods for stripping the people of all power. These bosses opposed just as vigorously the direct election of Senators, the local and State-wide primary. Now, driven to the last ditch, they are exactly in the same way opposing the presidential primary.

One of the finest compliments to this law is the enemies it has made. They have twisted and distorted the facts and, much to the amusement of those who are familiar with the presidential primary, have appended every adjective of abuse which the dictionary contains. Why all this vituperation? They are being driven from the field, and as they leave they turn for one more outburst against the laws which drive them from power.

To-day more than one-half of all the people of the United States live in presidential primary States. Nearly three-fourths of all the voters now vote to nominate the President by direct vote of the people. Twenty-five States have enacted presidential primary laws.

The Minnesota presidential primary law, for which I am directly responsible and of which I am the author, has been recognized by the 1916 Republican national committee, and the Minnesota delegates will be seated in that convention together with the delegates from 24 other sister States who similarly elect their delegates.

I introduced the bill in 1911 and twice in 1912, all of which times we were badly beaten. In 1913 I introduced the bill a fourth time. We won a unanimous vote in both house and senate, and the bill was signed by the governor.

This law places Minnesota in the front rank of primary States, and Minnesota is now very much in the national limelight by reason of the fact that we here nominate first of all the States.

The election was purposely placed on the town election day, so as to save expense and avoid duplication of work. On the same day St. Paul holds a city election, so that the people are not much inconvenienced by added burdens.

Certain amendments made during the 1915 session seem to have drawn down upon themselves the especial wrath of a certain few. For these amendments I am not responsible, since I was not then a member of the legislature. However, the law as it now stands has been twice unanimously upheld by the supreme court and only recently South Dakota passed the Minnesota statute almost word for word.

If this law is good enough to be accepted by a unanimous vote of the legislature, if it is good enough for the Republican national committee, which is now in sackcloth and ashes since the 1912 Republican disaster; if this law is good enough to be twice upheld by the supreme court; if other States base their laws upon it, it ought to be good enough for the elite of this State.

If the presidential primary is wrong in principle, then all primaries are wrong in principle. Let these men go before the people and state plainly that they do not believe the voters are competent to nominate.

To-day 25 States have the presidential primary, 55,261,362 people live under this law, and 9,522,455 voters will go to the polls to nominate their choice among the candidates for the Presidency. Gov. Wilson was nominated by the New Jersey presidential primary and elected President of the United States.

Senator Cummins, Theodore Roosevelt, President Wilson, William J. Bryan, Senator La Follette, and almost every man of national prominence has declared emphatically in favor of the primary principle as well as the presidential primary. Col. Roosevelt wrote me personally congratulating me most heartily upon the passage of this act.

It will be a fight to the finish. They dragged this law into the courts. The first clash before the supreme court was won by the people. Professional politicians and the big bosses everywhere, with few exceptions, seek to lay low every such law. In the near future an effort will be made to elect men to the legislature who will vote to repeal all primary laws. These men must be defeated, and only those elected who believe with Lincoln—that the people are competent to rule themselves by a majority vote.

You, the voters of Minnesota, must decide this contest. Will you return to the rule of a powerful few in midnight session behind locked doors, or do you wish to do the nominating yourselves? The time has come for the people of Minnesota to decide whether they approve of this extension of the franchise. Will you listen to President Wilson or Boss Murphy, Theodore Roosevelt or Boss Barnes, Bryan or Tammany, Cummins or the reactionaries of this State, the Supreme Court or certain self-appointed judges?

So bitter did their efforts become that one candidate for delegate at large in Minnesota in 1916 actually printed a pamphlet in foreign, unintelligible characters, and entitled it "A full explanation of Minnesota's presidential preference primary law, by one who knows." He stated that the law was unintelligible to him. I met this man and told him frankly that the absurdity of his attack would be resented by the voters. He was badly beaten in an expensive campaign.

In the past others have selected our delegates for us. We now propose to select our own delegates. Is there anything wrong about that? We are in the habit of nominating governors and United States Senators; can anyone advance any sane reason why we should not ourselves directly nominate our candidates for President?

Primary elections have swept the entire country. Conventions are disappearing. Those who fight against this irresistible tide are being thrust aside.

THE PEOPLE TAKE GREAT INTEREST IN THEIR PRIMARIES.

The enormous vote at every primary shows clearly that the voter is interested. Enough electors go to the polls to make the job of a boss decidedly difficult and uncomfortable in these later days.

The people's primary will increasingly become an instrument for political purification and real progress. It is directly in line with the movement to give the voters more direct control of their officeholders and the legislation which means so much for our common welfare. The voters want no hand-picked and boss-guaranteed nominees. They demand the right to nominate as well as the right to elect.

If the people are competent to elect they are also competent to nominate. When the nominations of both parties were made by a clique or group of selfish men under the convention system the election was often a mere rubber stamp on the choice of the bosses, since they often nominate both the Republican and Democratic nominees.

Candidates who must face the people are not so easily managed as they were in the good old days. Their records are now sifted by the voters. A candidate who opposes in the open a policy such as Government ownership of munition plants finds sledding hard, and he who advocates that we must not coin gold out of patriotism for private profit is always opposed by the selfish interests. The primary compels those who are interested in any reactionary scheme to go before the voter and explain his proposition. Many of these musty methods die in the sunlight when dragged from the cellars of intrigue.

Conventions and boss rule belong to the past. Those who wail and gnash their teeth are welcome to that pleasure. Their feeble efforts can not change the course of history.

The initiative and referendum in Oregon—

Says Gov. West, of that State—have done away with political machines, and politician conventions are dead. There is no lobbying in the halls of legislature, no automobiles or carriages to haul voters to the polls, and every man's vote counts the same whether he is a laborer or capitalist. The Oregon system is not a fad, and, aside from chronic officeholders and "interests" which need protection, there is no opposition in the State to any of the new features of our Government.

The recall applies to every office from constable to chief justice of the supreme court, and yet the exercise of that power has not been abused by the people. When you say that the people can not be trusted, then you say our Government is a failure. As yet there has been no occasion to exercise the function against any court. No judge in our State need fear action on account of a wrong decision in which outside influences can not be shown.

The press of the Northwest, including the three great dailies of Minneapolis, heralded the unanimous enactment of the presidential primary of Minnesota as a distinct step forward. They spread on their front pages articles to the effect that this law placed Minnesota in the spot light. Our State was actually the first to nominate in the 1916 contest, and Senator CUMMINS, of Iowa, was nominated. He was a progressive and indorsed by organized labor. Complaint was at once made that the Minnesota favorite was not nominated—that the law failed to function. As a matter of fact, if Elihu Root and others were afraid of the primary test they were unfit to hold the Presidency, at least from the standpoint of the average citizen. The law placed the primary on town election day, thereby cutting the expense greatly. The enemies of the law tried to secure double pay for all election officials, that thereby the expense account might be increased to the discredit of the presidential primary. This failed in the courts. Assailed from every side, it stood the test. The Minnesota law was copied by South Dakota, where the stand-pat element took their case to the Supreme Court of the United States. Here again the law was declared constitutional.

REPEALED BY THE LEGISLATURE.

When the law had proved itself workable, constitutional, and worthy of being copied by neighbor States, when it had driven the bosses out of their lair, then, desperate and fighting mad, these unscrupulous men took their case to a reactionary legislature. The law was finally repealed after a hard fight in 1917, at a time when the minds of the people were distracted by the world war, and so Minnesota, the North Star State, took one backward step. The governor unfortunately yielded to this reactionary pressure and signed the repeal bill without a murmur.

More lies were told, more falsehoods were related as to the Minnesota presidential primary than any other Minnesota act I ever heard of. May I suggest that this law will soon be back on our statute books, and that those who dare to disfranchise the people will be taking back seats? We are surrounded by States which have the presidential primary almost exactly the law we repealed. We have again been disgraced by the old gang—that unscrupulous crew that would scuttle the ship of State for selfish purposes—and now the reactionary press is starting a hue and cry to repeal all primary laws everywhere. But they will fail. The world war is ended but the battle for greater liberty and the rights of man has only begun.

THE PRESENT FIGHT TO REPEAL THE MINNESOTA PRIMARY.

The presidential primary of Minnesota has been repealed. An effort is now being made to repeal the State-wide primary. This attempt must be stopped. The people alone have that power. The Minnesota House of Representatives has already passed a bill repealing the State-wide primary 78 to 51. The senate is expected to follow suit.

Awake, my fellow citizens! There is yet time before the adjournment of this session of the legislature to defeat this nefarious attempt of the reactionaries to take away from you your right to select your nominees for public office. I feel sure that if the people of the State will convey to their representatives in a positive and determined manner their wish that the State-wide primary law shall not be repealed, that the presidential primary should be reenacted, the men who are now trying to steal their rights from them will not dare to go on with their work.

Minnesota is a great State. All of our people can not go to St. Paul to see that their rights are not destroyed by this theft of their franchise. The people in every community can select one or more spokesmen and send them to St. Paul to personally demand from the members of the house and senate that the wishes of the voters must be respected. If this be done the attempt to kill this good law will stop right where it is. Our legislature will not dare to refuse such a demand.

Let every organization and every individual citizen write or wire to the governor of the State and the senators and representatives of their districts to stop any further steps toward repealing this law.

This is an hour when every red-blooded Progressive in Minnesota, the Nonpartisan League, and organized labor must rally to a common standard and defend the rights of man. Freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and the right to vote are now being gradually destroyed. Fellow citizens, there can be no rest while our liberties are being stolen away.

Two years ago I appealed in vain to the members of the legislature against repealing the presidential primary. I now appeal direct to the people of Minnesota.

Unless the voters take action now these men will hold to their suicidal course until a patient people, finally exasperated, sweep them from their high places. The aristocracy of wealth means to rule or ruin. Their agent, the boss, wears a placid, sardonic smile bordering on contempt for the masses. Let history speak to them words of warning; they hear not, neither do they see. With their feet in the trough, they hear only the sound of their own hoggishness. "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." And, like the swine of old, they will dash themselves over the cliffs into the sea of oblivion.

THE CHICAGO NATIONAL CONVENTION OF 1912.

For many years the dissatisfaction with conventions on the part of the people at large has been very apparent. This culminated in the Chicago national convention in 1912. It was my pleasure and privilege to be one of the four men from Hennepin County to represent Minnesota in that convention.

I saw there enough to convince me that the presidential primary was the new order which would soon sweep the country.

I had introduced the presidential primary in 1911, twice in 1912, and I finally secured the passage of the act in 1913. In 1913 not a single vote was cast against the measure in the house committee, in the committee of the whole, nor was a single vote cast against the final passage in the house. The senate elections committee was unanimous for the measure. There was no opposition in the senate committee of the whole. Not one single vote was cast against the measure on its final passage in the senate. In 1916 I ran for delegate to the Republican national convention on a platform favoring the presidential primary and was elected by a large majority. In every speech I recounted my fight for the primary.

New Jersey, Wisconsin, North Dakota, Oregon, Nebraska, Louisiana, South Dakota, Ohio, and Massachusetts already had the presidential primary on their statute books in 1911. Since that time many other States have enacted the law, including Minnesota.

Col. Roosevelt declared for the presidential primary in unmistakable terms. In his letter to me he warmly extended congratulations on the passage of this very act.

Gov. Eberhardt, in a letter sent to A. O. Moerouix, editor of the Luverne Herald, declares for national presidential preference primaries and recommends the Minnesota law as a good one to copy. He further says Minnesota Republicans are in a splendid position when compared with other States. "We have taken the leadership and have set the example by which complete and harmonious unification of the Republican Party may be obtained. Our presidential preference primary solves the problem for us, and if adopted by the rest of the States will solve the question nationally." At another time the governor pointed to this law as a beacon light for other States to follow, "providing," says the governor, "a brilliant opportunity for the people to make possible the unification of the Republican Party by the people themselves." Says President Wilson, "If I had my way I would let no name come before the national conventions except the name ratified at the primaries of the people."

CHAMP CLARK, Speaker of the House of Representatives and a most able and courageous official, has this to say concerning national conventions:

In a convention with fifteen or twenty thousand howling, bellowing, perspiring visitors there is no more opportunity for deliberation than there would be in a boiler factory. There is little hope or chance of reforming the convention system; therefore it should be abolished utterly and presidential and vice presidential nominations should be made by primary elections.

Charles D. Hilles, chairman of the Republican national convention, favored "a uniform presidential primary law which will do away with the present State primaries." He prepared a statement on the subject, and an effort was made to have the national convention go on record as favoring such a measure.

"A progressive paper like the Minneapolis Journal should be in better business than leading a movement to return to the old boss-ruled convention system."—Frank Day, editor Fairmont Sentinel and former national committeeman.

Hon. Jonathan Bourne, jr., in a speech in the United States Senate, said:

The justice of all laws rests primarily on the integrity, ability, and disinterestedness of the individuals enacting them, those construing them, and those administering them.

I think all will concede that the times seem awry. Unrest exists throughout the civilized world. People are speculating as to the causes. Daily uncertainty grows stronger as to future events.

In my opinion the basic cause is that people have lost confidence in many of their public servants and bitterly resent attempted dictatorship by "would-be" political bosses and representatives of special interests who desire to direct public servants and legislation for their own selfish interests rather than assist in the enactment of laws guaranteeing justice to all and special privileges to none.

Successful and permanent government must rest primarily on recognition of the rights of men and the absolute sovereignty of the people. Upon these principles is built the superstructure of our Republic. Their maintenance and perpetuation measure the life of the Republic. These policies, therefore, stand for the rights and liberties of the people and for the power and majesty of the Government as against the enemies of both.

The people have been shocked by the number of business and political exposures which have been brought out in the last 10 years.

In many instances the people have lost confidence in their public servants, the same as many stockholders have lost confidence in corporation management. The remedy in government is the direct selection by the people of their public servants, with the resultant accountability of the public servant to the people and not to a political machine or boss. I purposely use the word "selection" rather than "nomination," for to my mind it more clearly expresses the idea of the responsibility of good citizenship. Selection implies the careful investigation of all and the resultant choice of one. The remedy in corporation management is rigid responsibility to government, equal obedience to laws and equal accountability to stockholders, giving the Government and the stockholders the fullest publicity of its operations, including absolute honesty and simplicity of its accounts, thus protecting the rights of the people and insuring to all the stockholders proportional enjoyment in the fruits of successful management.

There are doubtless some people who honestly believe that the people as a whole have not reached the stage of development qualifying them individually to participate in government. Others whom I credit with the intelligence which I have seen manifested by them in other directions assert the inability of the people to govern themselves as an excuse rather than a conviction; but I, Mr. President, from 30 years' experience in practical politics, am absolutely convinced not only that the people are fully capable of governing themselves, but that they are decidedly the best judges as to those individuals to whom they shall delegate the truly representative power.

Individual selfishness, cupidity, and ambition are minimized in the party or general electorate selections of public servants; good general service is demanded by the electorate, special service by the individual.

Hence my advocacy of popular government. By popular government I mean direct legislation as far as practicable, popular selection of candidates, and such regulation of political campaigns as will secure fair and honest elections. Popular selection under the present stage of evolution of our Government can be obtained only by direct primary laws and complete elimination of convention and caucus nomination of public officers.

I issued a statement to the Minnesota editors early in the fight, as follows:

During the past months we of Minnesota have been entertained by a weak but bitter attack upon our presidential primary law. This law gives every voter the right to nominate his choice for President among those who are candidates for that high office. Eighteen States now have the presidential primary. Millions are voting under it and no State legislature ever dared repeal the same. The national Republican committee has recognized the law in every such State, and in Minnesota, after a well-planned battle in our news columns, our supreme court sustained the law in every detail.

The supreme court also sustained the State-wide primary when that was attacked, and that high tribunal deserves the confidence and praise of every citizen. It has defeated every attempt to limit our franchise. The political boss who operated behind locked doors in midnight sessions no longer dictates the delegates to our national conventions. Is it any wonder that these men in vitriolic sentences urge vengeance upon the law that strips them of their power?

Gov. Eberhardt, in signing, praised this law as an example to be followed by other States. Gov. Hammond favored the presidential primary law. Gov. Burnquist voted for this present primary law. President Wilson, Bryan, and La Follette all have declared for the presidential primary, and President Roosevelt wrote me a letter congratulating me upon its passage. These men will be remembered long after the feeble attackers of the primary principle have completed their pernicious activities.

The law may have its defects; nothing human is perfect. But it was good enough to pass the scrutiny of the Supreme Court of Minnesota. A franchise once given the people will never be rescinded. This law extended our franchise, and I mean to give every ounce of strength within me to see that it stays on the statute books of Minnesota. Let those who wish to fight the law come forth and face the voters at the impending election.

January 4, 1911, the Minnesota Progressive Republican League declared—

Through the control of the government of this State by special interests and professional politicians the people have been denied a State-wide direct primary election law. We therefore most earnestly urge upon the legislature of this State to pass a direct primary election law that will include all elective State officers, United States Senators, and delegates to national conventions, with opportunity for the voter to express his choice for President and Vice President, so that the people of Minnesota may have equal political opportunities with the people of other States.

Senator Jonathan Bourne, jr., in a speech delivered in the United States Senate February 27, 1911, stated that—

The issue before the country is whether popular government, with general welfare its vitalizing force, shall save and develop this Nation, or delegated government, with selfishness the destroying force, shall bring the Nation to inevitable anarchy.

At our March 14, 1916, primary, Senator ALBERT BAIRD CUMMINS, of Iowa, was nominated for the Presidency, and he became the target for bitter ridicule. Yet the progressive record of Senator CUMMINS was one of which any man might well be proud.

Elihu Root refused to file as candidate for reasons best known to himself—no doubt he feared defeat—and CUMMINS was chosen. The President of the United States, however, did file and was victorious.

A NEW PRESIDENT IN 1920.

A presidential election is approaching, and even now men are playing the great game of politics for the Presidency. Shall the election of 1920 be dominated by boss-ruled conventions or shall it be governed by duly elected delegates of the people chosen in presidential primaries? In 1916 Minnesota passed through its first and only presidential primary election. Every boss in the State, every stand-pat newspaper, and every plotting schemer in league with big business rose to jeer and ridicule this law, a law which was based on the present Oregon and Wisconsin presidential primary laws. So successfully did they maneuver their assaults that they bullied the legislature and the governor into annulling the statute. Who will be our next President? Who shall carry the standard? Let him be selected by a national presidential primary. Let him be the people's choice and let him remember that he will sit where Washington and Lincoln once sat. Government machinery will perhaps never be perfect; it can, however, be much improved in the interests of the great American people. We face to the East and move forward!

The time is ripe, and rotten ripe, for change;
Then let it come; I have no dread of what
Is called for by the instinct of mankind.
Nor think I that God's world would fall apart
Because we tear a parchment more or less.
Truth is eternal, but her effluence,
With endless change, is fitted to the hour;
Her mirror is turned forward to reflect
The promise of the future, not the past.
I do not fear to follow out the truth,
Albeit along the precipice's edge.
Let us speak plain; there is more force in names
Than most men dream of, and a lie may keep
Its throne a whole lot longer if it skulk
Behind the shield of some fair-seeming name.
Let us call tyrants tyrants, and maintain
That only freedom comes by grace of God,
And all that comes not by His grace must fail,
For men in earnest have no time to waste
In patching fig leaves for the naked truth.

—James Russell Lowell.

[From McClures.]

THE CHAOS IN NATIONAL POLITICS.

In 1896 Mark Hanna gave up the coal and iron business, and—seeing there was no rational method of choosing Presidents in the United States—decided to choose them himself. He had worked out the possibilities of the Republican national convention.

This convention is probably the most extraordinary political institution on earth. In the first place, it has chosen for 50 years the most powerful ruler in the world; for it has named every President of the United States, except one, in the past two generations.

In the second place, it is under absolutely no legal control in doing this. No State has any power over it; it is a thing outside of States; the National Government has no jurisdiction over it, for the United States—by the terms of its eighteenth-century Constitution—is given no authority over the election of its Presidents. The national convention which names them is a so-called voluntary association, an independent, self-governing body, which makes its own laws. If it required that all its members must balance themselves five minutes on their thumbs before becoming eligible to nominate Presidents, it would be perfectly within its rights.

In the third place, this national convention is an absolutely unrepresentative body. Other political conventions are made up of delegates each one of whom represents a certain number of party votes. The national convention is made up on the plan of the Federal Congress—two delegates for every United States Senator and Representative in the country, and a few extra delegates for Territories and Districts. About two thirds of these men are elected by the voters of the Republican Party; the other third, in the South and Federal districts, where there is no Republican Party, in practice elect themselves.

HANNA STARTS THE "STEAM ROLLER."

Hanna, being a practical man, very soon brought to a full system the possibilities which were always in the Republican national convention. He made a business contract with the self-elected delegates in the South and other places for their votes; he then secured control over the Republican national committee, which has the power to make up the "temporary roll" of the convention—that is, to decide in case of contest which delegates shall be admitted to it.

Hanna nominated and elected McKinley, and established the system of choosing Presidents—now known as the "steam roller"—which has named every President of the United States since that time. Its operation is this:

The President of the United States and his agent, the chairman of the Republican national committee, appoint to Federal offices the men, in the sections where there is no Republican Party, who are capable of electing themselves delegates to the national convention; these delegates repay them with their votes at the next convention to nominate a President. In this way the President and chairman practically appoint nearly one-third of the delegates in a national convention, and vote them as they choose.

If this does not give them enough delegates, they have in reserve the control of the national committee, which is committed to go as far as possible in seating their delegates, as against others contesting their places.

With these two instruments the weakest President can scarcely fail to win a majority of a national convention, nominate himself or his candidate, and choose his own national committee again. With the patronage of the country in his hands to dispense, he has all the time nearly a majority of a national convention in his employ.

McKinley was murdered, Hanna died, and the control of this Federal machine passed from them to Roosevelt, and from Roosevelt to Taft. Under increasing Republican majorities it grew stronger every year. And so at last the present year for choosing another President came.

HOW OUR PRESIDENTS HAVE BEEN CHOSEN.

The process was begun early in 1911—months before action was legal—by overeager professional delegates in the South electing themselves to the Republican national convention. Then came, in early December, the national committee's call for the convention, and the old machine started briskly to work to select the next President, starting in the usual place—the section of the country where there is no Republican Party.

Now, this machine of professional delegates is a very dominant and definite organization. At its head is the President, and the chairman of the national committee, whom he appoints. From the chairman the orders are sent to a curious, quasipublic official, the State "referee."

A "referee" is the dispenser of Federal offices in the Southern States, where there are no Republican Senators and Representatives to indicate who shall have them. He is usually a member of the national committee from the State. Under him are the officeholders whom he selects, who are the same men that control the Republican Party machinery, and elect themselves and their dependents delegates to the Republican national convention.

The Federal manager of the professional southern delegates this year was Charles D. Hillis, first the President's secretary, and now chairman of the national committee. It was clear from the beginning that the machine had difficult work before it. President Taft had not been very tactful in its management, but, far worse than that, there was a general fear in the machine that he would probably not be reelected. And then, in the last of February, ex-President Roosevelt, formerly in control of the organization, appeared as a party candidate against Taft. The organization was threatened with disruption. Its management began early and forced to the limit those singular travesties on representative government—the southern conventions to nominate delegates to the Republican national convention.

MANUFACTURING SOUTHERN DELEGATES.

In many cases it was simply necessary for the manager of the convention district to send out his invitation to a few picked friends and hold his convention—as in former quieter years. In many cases—on account of the unusual competition—it was necessary to issue badges or tickets admitting into the convention halls only the delegates desired. In other cases, where negroes were not desired, the conventions were called in places where negroes dared not go—the "white men's towns" of the South.

Generally speaking, the old Federal machine did its work successfully in the South. Three or four "referees" of States went with the Roosevelt cause, but the majority stayed within the old ranks. And where there were revolts, new temporary managers were put in charge of the Federal officeholders of the State, and the regular operations of the machine went on.

But in the meantime a more threatening movement was developing. The actual Republican Party in the North was attempting to force a form of representative government in the choice of a President—the new form of the presidential primary. In spite of the opposition of the Federal machine to these primaries many laws were passed allowing them; a dozen States expressed their preference for the presidential candidate by direct vote, and half a dozen more gave a partial expression. In all, States casting between a half and two-thirds of the Republican votes for President expressed their preference and voted more than 2 to 1 against the nomination of President Taft. It was now the time for the Republican national committee to begin its work.

The leaders of the committee came together to consider the situation. A canvass of the committee was made, and 33 of the 53 members were found to be ready to "go down the line" for the administration, in deciding the cases of contested delegates. Half a dozen more could be counted on in nearly every case.

THE OLD MACHINE'S LAST STAND.

The elections of delegates ended, and the national committee met to make out the "temporary roll" for the national convention. It was now clear that only through their efforts could the administration get the 540 votes needed for a majority. The first act of the committee was to pass two rulings. The first of these made it impossible for the minority of the committee opposed to the machine to debate on any contest; the second prevented them from putting on the record the votes of the individual members of the committee. The thirty-odd members of the machine moved as a body, anonymously and in silence, to elect the majority it needed.

There was never any doubt of the fact that the great majority of the Republican Party did not want the President renominated. The difficult question was whether the national committee could force out enough delegates from the contest to make a majority of the delegates. It finally was able to do this, and the official candidate was nominated by a margin of 21 votes out of 1,078. A national committee which could be counted on was again elected; and the convention adjourned with the old mechanism intact. But it was no longer a machine which would choose a President. That machine was destroyed, and with it went the whole scheme of party government in choosing a President.

The majority of the Republican Party had found it impossible to register its will; the national convention was not, and never had been, a representative body. So the Northern States simply withdrew. And immediately the whole structure fell to pieces, and with it the Republican Party, which had governed the country for half a century. The old self-governing machine had been entirely independent of law; when it split, it had no rights under law—not even to its party name.

The election of Presidents in the United States—under the provisions of the Constitution—is really a series of State elections, carried on by State parties. Now, at the beginning the parties of States were voluntary associations—exactly as the national organizations are now. But gradually the States regulated and recognized them by law. And so, when the national Republican Party flew to pieces, the fragments became at once State parties.

No one voted for a President of the United States; the vote is for electors—a set of State officers equal to the State's representation in Congress; and these men choose the President. They are, in fact, a part of the outworn machinery of our old United States Constitution—being State delegates, expected to exercise their own judgment in selecting the Nation's President. For a century the practice has been for each State party to nominate its own electors, these electors to be pledged to vote for the candidate of their national party.

For a century there has been no case of consequence where the elector refused to vote for the candidate of his party. But, with the dissolution of the national Republican Party in Chicago, the elector became again the representative of the party in his State; there was no national law touching the subject of his obligation; and no State law would recognize the unlegal national party against the legal party within its own borders. The electors for President will vote according to the sentiment of their State—in some cases according to their own judgment of the situation. The old machine stands aghast; it is absolutely helpless.

THREE PARTIES—AN IMPOSSIBLE CONDITION.

It has done more than this, however. It threatens to break down all our antique machinery for choosing Presidents. For to every appearance a strong new party is in the process of creation; and the mechanism for electing Presidents in the United States is not equipped to deal with more than two strong parties in choosing Presidents.

In the last of the eighteenth century, when our Constitution was made, public officers were generally elected by majority vote. Since then, in practically all political contests, a mere plurality vote has been sufficient for election. But for the election of the President of the United States a majority is still essential. To be elected requires a majority of the electors from the different States. This, with three parties of approximately equal strength, would quite often be impossible.

In case of no majority in the electoral college, the Members of the House of Representatives, casting 1 vote for each State—must choose a President, by a majority vote, from the three leading candidates. With three parties a majority would easily be impossible here.

In case of permanent failure to elect a President an attempt would be made to choose a Vice President who would act in his place. But that with three parties might be equally impossible, for the same majority vote is required first from the electors, and then, in case of failure, from the United States Senate. A deadlock like this would leave the country without a President.

It is not impossible that such a deadlock may come this fall. In the easily conceivable case of no one candidate getting a majority of the electoral votes, it would very likely come. The House of Representatives, as it now stands, has 22 State delegations which would vote Democratic, 22 which would be Republican, and 4 in which the Members are tied. A similar situation exists in the Senate, where there is a nominal Republican majority but where the split between the Republicans has already for two years made it impossible to get a majority to elect a temporary President.

Such a deadlock may not come this fall; but, with three national parties, it may come any time. And when it comes—probably not before—there will be an overhauling of our antiquated methods of choosing Presidents by an amendment of our Constitution.

Meanwhile the new movement for popular government pushes on, tearing the old unrepresentative forms to pieces as it goes. The result for the moment is political chaos. It will be worse and worse confounded until rational and thoroughly representative machinery of government is provided.

[From La Follette's, Apr. 8, 1911.]

THE PEOPLE AND THE PRESIDENCY.

You should know the National Progressive Republican League. You should know its great purpose. This organization marks the first national, virile, and promising movement for representative democracy in this country since the Declaration of Independence.

"The object of the league," declares its declaration of principles, "is the promotion of popular government and progressive legislation."

ORGANIZERS OF THE PROGRESSIVE LEAGUE.

The subscribers to its declarations of principles and organizers of the league are men known to the country as exponents of real democracy. Its officers are: President, Senator Bourne, of Oregon; first vice president, Congressman NORRIS, of Nebraska; second vice president, Gov. Osborn, of Michigan; treasurer, Charles R. Crane, of Illinois; secretary, Frederic C. Howe, of New York. On its executive committee are Senators Clapp, of Minnesota, and Bristow, of Kansas; and Congressmen Hubbard, of Iowa; LENROOT, of Wisconsin; and Kent, of California; and the "founder of conservation," Gifford Pinchot, of Pennsylvania, and the leader of Progressive Republicanism in New Jersey, George L. Record, of New Jersey.

Other Progressive Republican United States Senators among the founders of the league are Dixon, of Montana; Beveridge, of Indiana; GRONNA, of North Dakota; CUMMINS, of Iowa; and LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin. The charter membership of the league includes also a score of Progressive Republican Congressmen, as well as several Progressive governors of States and a number of leading citizens in private life from Maine to California, leaders in the nation-wide struggle to reestablish in place of Aldrichism and Cannonism the true Republicanism of Abraham Lincoln.

THE FUNDAMENTAL IDEA.

Not merely because it is an organization, a banding together of recognized leaders in public affairs, leaders who enjoy the confidence of the people, but more because for what the league stands for is its organization so important, so portentous. Its program is one idea—the only dynamic, militant, growing idea in American politics to-day: The people shall control their Government; "the will of the people shall be the supreme law of the land."

For "the promotion of popular government" this organization advances five concrete proposals, each applying the fundamental idea in effective practical terms to the correction of important defects and commissions in the system of government.

THE PROGRAM.

First. United States Senators shall be elected by direct vote of the people. Thus the Senate, the great citadel of privilege, shall be made responsible to the people and responsive to their demands.

Second. All elective officials shall be nominated by the people in direct primaries. Thus shall the power of the system and its "bosses" to control, through the caucus and convention system, the nomination of party candidates for office be destroyed.

Third. The people shall elect their delegates to national conventions and have the opportunity to express at the polls their choice for party candidates for President and Vice President. Thus shall the people have the power now exercised by system-controlled conventions to name the men from whom the people must choose their Chief Magistrate. And of this we have more to say in this roll call.

Fourth. State constitutions shall be amended to provide for the initiative, referendum, and the recall. Thus shall the people be empowered directly to exercise their will in making the laws under which they are to be governed and to remove from office unfaithful public servants.

Fifth. A thoroughgoing corrupt-practices act shall put an end to the power of dollars and corrupting influences as controlling forces in government.

Here, then, is a program based upon a single principle, upon that fundamental tenet of the Declaration of Independence, that governments "derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." Government must always in the main be exercised and administered through agents acting for and under the authority of the people. History demonstrates that these agents of government faithfully represent the people only when their authority and opposition are derived from the people and subject to the control of the people. The program of the National Progressive Republican League proposes to apply this principle to every elective office, from the President of the United States down.

It sometimes happens, as it happened in 1904, that a national convention, although dominated as to its organization and control by a system machine, accedes for political expediency the nomination of a popular candidate, but such a result under the present system of nominating presidential candidates is the fruit of political chance rather than a concession to the public wish. In a national convention the voice of the people is rarely heard above the din of the "steam roller."

IMPORTANCE OF THE PRESIDENCY.

The office of President of the United States is a position of vital strategic importance in the control of the Government of ninety millions. Students of political institutions tell us that the Chief Magistrate of the United States possesses more arbitrary power than the head of any other civilized government in the world. History shows that the President's power of veto on legislation is almost an absolute power. History, and particularly current history, demonstrates the President's absolute power of veto by nonadministration of the laws. If the people succeed in forcing Congress to enact just laws in the public interest, the laws themselves may be defeated by the President and the Cabinet officers appointed by him by simply neglecting their enforcement. The President takes no oath to execute the laws of Congress. The only recourse left to the people under the Constitution is impeachment, and again history shows that it is a practical impossibility to impeach a high executive officer of the Government.

Nor is the power of the President measured by his legislative and administrative veto. By the use of his power to control patronage he may and has exercised sinister influence in legislation. Witness the following from the now famous "Beverly letter" written by Secretary Norton:

"While Republican legislation pending in Congress was opposed by certain Republicans, the President deemed it to be his duty to the party and to the country to withhold Federal patronage from certain Senators and Congressmen who seemed to be in opposition to the administration's efforts to carry out his promises of the party platform."

Of course, in determining his "duty" in the premises the President was guided by his individual judgment and the counsel of his system advisers.

Wholly aside from the bribery of patronage, Presidents may, and at times have, by the exercise of the powerful influence of their office, spoken the deciding vote in the enactment of legislation.

PRESIDENT NOT AMENABLE TO THE PEOPLE.

It was urged in behalf of the adoption of the Federal Constitution that the desire of the President for reelection at the end of his four years' term would make him amenable to the public demands. This safeguard has been destroyed through the extra constitutional agency of the political nominating convention. The modern development of political partisanship, dividing the people upon obsolete issues and along sectional lines, places in the power of the incumbent of the presidency through the control of patronage and the "Federal machine" the dictation of his own renomination by a political convention held during his term as President regardless of popular approval or disapproval of his conduct in office. Frequently at the end of his second term, when, according to unwritten law, he can not again succeed himself, this same power enables him to dictate the nomination of his successor.

It is the common experience that people do not correct evils in their established institutions out of a deference merely to principles. Recognized wrongs are generally submitted to until the people are driven by some act of oppression to take measures for their correction.

A WRONG AND WHAT CAME OF IT.

In 1904 the lawfully constituted Republican convention, representing the majority of the Republican voters in Wisconsin, chose delegates to the Republican national convention. A minority of the State convention, representing system interests in politics, unable to control the convention of the party, organized a bolters' "convention," which nominated a candidate for governor and named delegates to the Republican national convention to contest at Chicago the seating of the delegates at large accredited from the duly constituted convention.

The delegation from the bolters' "convention" was headed by conspicuous servitors of the system. The system-controlled committees of the national convention, after a sham hearing of the contest, as a matter of course, seated in that convention the delegates at large of the system bolters' "convention" from Wisconsin, declaring that this was the real Republican State convention.

Afterwards the State Supreme Court, in an action involving the election ballot, held that the "convention" which sent to Chicago the delegates who were seated by the system-controlled committee of the national convention was not the Republican State convention of Wisconsin. Afterwards the Republican electors at the polls gave to the candidate for governor of that alleged "convention" 12,136 votes, as against 227,253 votes given to the candidate nominated by the convention whose delegates were thrown out at Chicago.

The Legislature of Wisconsin elected at the same time, in response to the outraged public sentiment of the State, enacted chapter 369 of the Laws of Wisconsin for 1905, by which the people of Wisconsin by law took into their own hands at their general primaries the business of choosing delegates to national conventions, the first law of its kind in the United States. Under this statute the voters of Wisconsin themselves chose their delegates to national conventions in 1908. The delegates thus chosen by the voters at their party primaries represented the Republicans of Wisconsin in the Republican national convention of 1908, and they presented to that convention the now justly famed minority platform of progressive planks in the public interest.

THE OREGON LAW.

When, in 1908, the machine-controlled State convention instructed delegates to the national convention in behalf of the candidate whose candidacy did not have the approval of the people, the people of the State by initiative legislation enacted a law providing, like the Wisconsin law, for popular election of delegates to national conventions, and in addition providing for a popular election by the voters at the polls of their choice for candidates for President and Vice President. Upon the returns every elected delegate is required to subscribe an oath of office that he will "to the best of his judgment and ability faithfully carry out the wishes of his political party as expressed by its voters at the time of his election." With such a law in operation in every State the national political convention will become, as to the nomination of party candidates, like the constitutional Electoral College, merely an instrument for registering the people's choice.

SENATOR BOURNE'S SPEECH.

In his speech in the Senate on the 27th of last February, Senator Bourne, of Oregon, in discussing the Oregon presidential preference law, analyzed conditions which, in addition to the general criticisms that apply generally to the caucus and convention system, operate to make national conventions hopelessly misrepresentative. From his speech we print the following:

"Mr. President, the most important measure enacted or adopted by the people of Oregon at the recent election, and, in fact, next to the initiative and referendum, the most important law enacted by any State in recent years, is the law permitting voters in party primaries to elect their delegates to national conventions and to instruct them through popular expression of choice for President and Vice President. This law, when enacted in all States, will absolutely destroy the power of Federal machine to renominate a President or determine his successor. The 'steam roller' will be relegated to the political scrap heap and its operators to the shadow of things forgotten, while fourth-class postmasters will, as they should, cease to be a political asset for anybody or any party.

"In the light of past experience it seems to me this plan should appeal to all patriotic citizens as well as to conscientious partisans. It is a well-recognized fact that nominations by national conventions are the exclusive work of politicians, which the electorate of the whole United States is permitted only to witness in gaping expectancy and to ratify at the polls in the succeeding November. As unrepresentative as this feature of the national convention is, its flagrancy pales into insignificance in the presence of that other abuse against partisan conscience and outrage upon the representative system, which is wrought by the Republican politician in hopelessly Democratic States and by the Democratic politician in hopelessly Republican States in dominating the national conventions with the presence of these unrepresentative delegations that represent neither party, people, nor principle."

When Senator Bourne referred to the Oregon presidential preference law there was recognition from an unexpected source of the truth of his charge of the misrepresentative character of national conventions. Senator Hale desired Senator Bourne to "explain the provisions of this scheme of his that will prevent, in the national convention, representatives of the administration, whichever it may be, Democratic or Republican, who represent no electoral votes but are counted whether in one convention of the Republicans or in the other convention of the Democrats—delegates who represent nobody, and yet who may control the choice." In answer Senator Bourne had printed in the RECORD with his speech the Oregon law in full.

THE "FEDERAL MACHINE."

"The President of the United States," said Senator Bourne, "through his power of nominating Federal appointees, is the head of the greatest political machine the world has ever seen. Whether the President is a shrewd politician directing the machine himself or entirely ignorant of politics and delegating the power to another, the system is most pernicious.

"Statistics compiled by the Civil Service Commission, but acknowledged to be incomplete, show that on June 30, 1910, the number of employees in the executive civil service was 384,088. This does not include officers or enlisted men of the Army or Navy nor clerks in fourth-class post offices, the latter numbering about 64,000.

"The utilization of this force along selfish lines would be most dangerous, pernicious, and demoralizing. An Executive desiring to misuse this power would, in effect, start with a campaign contribution of $345,000,000 per annum and an organization of 384,000 individuals, all directed toward selfish interest, namely, perpetuation of the power of the Executive and of the individuals owing their position and advancement of this power.

THE NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

"The Republican national committee consists of 53 members, one from each State, Territory, District, and island possession. The Territory of Alaska, with no electoral vote and but two delegates in the convention, has the same representation and power in the national committee as the great State of New York, with 39 electoral votes and 78 delegates. The committee elects its own chairman and perfects its organization. It decides on place and time of convention. It recommends how many delegates shall be admitted from each State and Territory, how the delegates and alternates shall be chosen in the various States, how the delegates from Territories shall be selected, and recommends who shall serve as temporary chairman of the national convention. The chairman of the national committee calls the convention to order and generally directs the campaign.

"In the Republican national convention committees on credentials, permanent organization, and resolutions are composed of one delegate from each State and Territory. Each State selects its own representative on these committees and offers them to the convention. The committee on permanent organization recommends the permanent chairman and confirms the other officers who are recommended by the national committee. Control of the national committee by the administration gives tremendous power, which is made absolute if combined with control of the committee on credentials. If the operators of the machine find that, even with the advantage of control of delegations from the Democratic States and Territories, they will not have enough votes in the convention to control its action, contesting delegations will appear from a number of States, by seating some of which the necessary additional strength may be secured.

CONVENTION MAJORITIES.

"National conventions are not representative of the wishes of the members of the party who are depended upon to cast the votes to elect the ticket. In the 1908 Republican national convention 980 delegates were admitted under the terms of the national committee's call; 491, or a majority, were necessary for a nomination. The Southern States and Territories, giving no electoral votes, with the exception of Maryland, which gave Taft and Sherman 2 out of 8, had 338 votes, leaving 153 to be secured to give a majority. Thus, it will be seen that under such circumstances any candidate controlling the delegations from Southern Democratic States and Territories would have to secure only 153 votes, while any other candidate would have to secure 491 votes from those States which give electoral votes as well as delegates.

Under the referee system in the South and the patronage system in the Territories and insular possessions, a President, through his nominating power and the Federal machine, can, if he desires, practically control the votes of these delegations in a convention. Then, with his power in other States, and the tremendous influence of the Federal machine, it requires but little other influence to give him the 153 additional votes necessary for his renomination or the nomination of the man he selects. The Southern States and Territories, giving no electoral votes to the Republican Party, are under the domination of the machine through the referee system, and have greater influence in naming the Republican nominees for President and Vice President than have the combined States of New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Massachusetts, Indiana, and Iowa, which collectively have 334 delegates.

TRUST THE PEOPLE.

"Proud of American institutions and of every page of history that records their progress, I have been loth to point to evils that exist. Preferring peace to controversy, I have long delayed public utterance of views frequently expressed to Members of this body. But putting aside personal inclinations and placing public welfare above all else, I have endeavored to present what appear to be facts regarding gross abuse of the presidential appointing power.

"I have confidence in the intelligence and honesty and resourcefulness of the American people. They have capacity to judge whether trading of Federal patronage for votes in Congress or in convention is either constitutional or wise. They have the honesty and the courage to make their opinions known, and they have the resourcefulness to find means to express their views. We will leave the subject to the judgment and conscience of the American people, knowing that in their own time and in their own way they will voice their desire and enforce their will."

NAMING THE NEXT PRESIDENT.

[By Mark Sullivan.]

The two candidates for President next year (1912) will be chosen by the two great national conventions next June or July. The delegates to these two conventions, in most of the States, will not be chosen by the people; in some, they will be chosen by the local bosses; in others, by Federal officeholders, grateful for past favors and hopeful of future ones. These delegates will go to the conventions and will vote as their particular State bosses tell them, and, when the convention adjourns, the party nominee will be, not the choice of the individual members of the party but the net result of the private negotiations of the various bosses, with just so much prudent deference to popular sentiment as seems necessary. (Back of the bosses, of course, will be the big corporations.) That is the old way of nominating candidates for the Presidency.

THE NEW WAY.

In a few States where the direct primary idea has penetrated deeply a new system will go into effect the coming year. In New Jersey, Nebraska, North Dakota, Wisconsin, and Oregon the individual member of the Republican Party will go to the polls and say whether he wants Taft or La Follette or some one else to be the Republican nominee for the Presidency. And when the national convention meets every delegate from those States must vote as the majority of the Republican voters in his State have told him to vote. Similarly every Democrat in the States named will have the chance to go to the polls and say whether he wants Harmon or Wilson or Clark or Underwood or Folk or Bryan to be the Democratic nominee.

LOGIC.

There is no escaping the logic of the presidential primary. If it is right for the individual to vote at the election, why is it not right for him to vote at the primary also? If the individual is capable of choosing between Taft and Harmon—assuming that they are the candidates at the election—why is he not also capable of choosing between Taft and La Follette, between Wilson and Harmon?

[From La Follette's, Dec. 20, 1913.]

THE PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARY.

Mr. Wilson's recommendation for the nomination of presidential candidates by direct vote strikes at the root of a great wrong. If government is to be brought back to the people it is quite as important to make the executive department serve public interest as it is to make the legislative department serve public interest.

After a struggle of 80 years we have finally achieved the election of United States Senators by direct vote. The States will soon have provided for the nomination of all Senators and Representatives in Congress by the direct method. In the end this will make the will of the people the law of the land. But the best legislation which the wit of man can devise will fail to give us representative government unless the laws are executed in the same spirit in which they are enacted.

The Sherman antitrust law placed in the hands of the Executive the strongest, most perfect weapon which human ingenuity could forge for the protection of the public against the power and sordid greed of monopoly. That weapon was permitted to rust in its scabbard almost unused while criminal conspiracies against the free markets of our country thrived on every hand, made bold by Executive indifference or openly encouraged by Executive sanction.

The gravest problems confronting the American people to-day are in no small part the direct result of Executive failure to enforce the law prohibiting combinations in the form of trusts and conspiracies to suppress and destroy competition.

Upon President Wilson falls the burden of all that his immediate predecessors in office left behind them as the result of an effort to establish national prosperity through the benign influence of the Morgans, the Harrimans, and big business generally.

The power of these men and the great combinations back of them would not have been so effective with Presidents and Cabinets in the past if there had been no national conventions subject to their control.

Through their henchmen they have managed the election of national delegates, selected national committeemen, manipulated the organization of national conventions, made or modified platforms to their liking, and been close at hand when combinations were effected which settled the choice of presidential candidates.

No man who witnessed the proceedings of the Republican convention at Chicago, where fraud and deceit were almost evenly matched and the precious rights of 7,000,000 Republicans were trampled under foot in the mad strife between two candidates who cared only to win a personal victory—no man who witnessed that contest could ever wish to see another presidential nominating convention in the United States.

At best a nominating convention is never a deliberative body. Its work is hurriedly performed. There is no time for a calm, judicial determination of even the most vital matters. High pressure and extreme tension mark all its proceedings. Personal and factional feeling run high. Delegates are cajoled and badgered, and manufactured enthusiasm is ever ready at the most critical juncture to stampede the convention and win in a fury of excitement.

The storm center of contending prejudice and passion, a national convention, is the last place where rational human beings would be willing to try out and decide any important question affecting personal or property rights. With the very life of our free institutions at stake, it is the last place where great political parties should nominate their candidates for the high office of President of the United States.

Even if men chosen as delegates were never guilty of willful and corrupt betrayal of trust, if bargains and deals and bribery could be eliminated, nevertheless the presidential nominating convention should be abolished, because it removes the nomination too far from the voter, the trustee too far from him for whom he bears a trust, the agent too far from the principal.

If a public official, high or low, owes his nomination to a political machine or to corporate influence he is certain in some degree to yield to that influence and in like measure to ignore the great body of his party and the public. If he owes his nomination to the direct vote of the people he will do the people's service.

That a national convention should be held for the purpose of formally declaring the result of the direct primary and framing the platforms of the parties, there will be no contention. But the convention, charged with the grave duty of formulating the pledges of the party, should be composed of a body of men accountable for their action directly to those whom they represent. The members of a delegate convention feel no definite, binding, personal responsibility except to a few conspicuous leaders. The action of the delegate is merged into the action of the mass. The service of the delegates terminates with the adjournment of the convention. There is no continuing of official obligation. Platforms framed by one set of men to be executed by another set of men open wide the door for honest differences of opinion as to the meaning of its terms and for the dishonest and shifty evasion of its pledges.

President Wilson is on strong and unassailable ground when he recommends that platforms be framed by those responsible to the people for carrying them into effect. As he suggests, those responsible to the public for the faithful execution of the platform promises of each party are the party nominees for Congress, the nominees for vacant seats in the Senate of the United States, the Senators whose terms have not yet closed, the national committees, and the candidates for the presidency themselves.

The participation of the national committee in formulating the platform is a matter of detail upon which there may be difference of opinion. But it is an elementary principle that the trustee should be a party to the contract which creates the trust. The officials or the candidates who, if elected, will be charged with the duty of redeeming the pledges of the platform, are logically the men who should make the party platform.

This declaration of principles, this promise to perform, this specific pledge to enact certain legislation is submitted to the voter and when accepted by him becomes a solemn and binding covenant between the officials who framed the platform and the voter who has staked his faith upon the integrity of its performance by the candidate for whom he casts his ballot.

President Wilson's recommendation will be enacted into law, if not by his own party, then by those who shall come after. It will make Presidents more responsive to the will of the people. It will make platform pledges sacred and binding.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

KANSAS TO THE FRONT.

Gov. W. R. Stubbs, of Kansas, is a Progressive Republican executive of a progressive Republican State. His recent message to the legislature expresses plainly the will of the people. He recommends the enactment of laws providing for the initiative and referendum, the recall, workmen's compensation for industrial accidents, election of United States Senators by direct vote, Federal income tax, and judicial reform. He urges also that the people be given the opportunity to name their choice for President and Vice President. To quote:

"I recommend that you amend the primary-election law so that delegates to the national convention may be elected at the primary election, and that the names of the candidates for President and Vice President shall be placed on the ballot that the people of Kansas may instruct their delegates on nominations for President and Vice President."

Kansas is taking her place beside Wisconsin and Oregon. What State will be next in line? Let the people of Kansas stand solidly back of Stubbs and the legislature! And let the people of every other State get together and demand that their legislatures give them the means whereby they may break the hold of the system and name their own President! Now is the time to act.

[From the Commoner, Dec. 15, 1911.]

The simple meaning of this heavy phrase is that the presidential nominees next year shall be named by the people at the polls, not by bosses in back rooms. (Mark Sullivan, in Collier's Weekly.)

The presidential primary means just this: It gives you the right to go to the polls and say who the nominee of your party for President should be. It means that if you are a Republican you can go to the polls and say whether you want Taft, La Follette, Hughes, or someone else to be the Republican candidate for President; if you are a Democrat, you shall have the privilege of choosing among Harmon, Clark, Underwood, Wilson, Folk, or any other favorite you may have.

Any candidate will prejudice himself with a heavy handicap who delays too long in accepting the presidential primary, which is the same thing as saying that he does not want the nomination unless a majority of the voters want him to have it.

THE LA FOLLETTE POSITION.

From the resolutions adopted by the insurgent conference at Chicago, October 16:

"We favor the choice of Republican voters as to candidates for President by a direct primary vote, held in check, pursuant to the statute, and where no such statute exists we urge that the Republican State committee provide that the people be given the right to express their choice for President."

WILL SOME STANDPATTER ANSWER THIS?

If the voter is capable of choosing between Harmon and Taft (assuming them to be the two candidates), why is he not also capable of choosing between Harmon and Wilson? Between Taft and La Follette?

AN ENTERPRISING COUNTY CHAIRMAN.

The northwestern corner of the United States, with British Columbia on the north and Vancouver Island across the Gulf of Georgia to the west, is called Whatcom County. It has a Republican central committee, and its chairman is W. P. Brown. Mr. Brown's position is this: If the State of Washington gives him a presidential primary, well and good; if not, he is going to have one anyhow for his county. He and his committee have evolved a plan. He says it might not work in very large cities, but that it is perfectly practicable for Whatcom, with 17,000 voters. Doubtless Mr. Brown would be glad to explain his plan to any other country chairman who finds himself in the same position; that is to say, willing to hold the presidential primary, but handicapped by the lack of a State statute. Mr. Brown's address is Bellingham, Wash., and such inquiring persons as write him ought to inclose stamps.—Mark Sullivan in Collier's Weekly.

PRESIDENTIAL PRIMARIES WILL GIVE PARTY PLATFORMS DIGNITY AND BUILDING FORCE.

[By Herbert Quick.]

President Wilson has demanded of Congress a presidential primary law. If we had had such a law last campaign, Wilson would have helped formulate his own platform.

To have platforms adopted by delegate conventions is to make them despicable and despised, as they have always been; to have them adopted by a convention of candidates after nomination is to give them dignity, solemnity, and building force.

[From the Minneapolis Journal.]

THE PRINCIPLE IS RIGHT.

As chairman of the house elections committee last winter, Gunnar B. Bjornson helped to tinker the 1913 presidential preference primary law, and he refuses to admit that the law is entirely rotten. The kicks against it all come from the practical politicians, he says in a Minnesota Mascot editorial. In part, the editorial says:

"It is very probable that our presidential primary is not right. It is very probable that it needs some 'repairs.' But the principle of it is right. It is right to try to get at the will of the people. It is right to try to devise machinery that will register the people's choice in the matter of nominations as well as elections. Just now it is popular to 'jump onto' the presidential primary. At least the enemies of all primaries are trying to make it so. They are trying to tell the people that the presidential primary is a farce, that it can not be worked out, that it will serve no good purpose. But all this abuse does not do much good. The law is here. It is up to the voters of this State to make the most of it, to make it yield the best possible results. The people have it in their power to kill the presidential preferential if they want to. If they ignore it or display the lack of intelligence that is expected in the use of it, why, then, the enemies of it can more easily get it killed in the next legislature."

DON'T BE STAMPEDED.

Criticism of the Minnesota presidential primary law has been persistent.

Also this criticism has been bitter in proportion as the mediums of expression have been friendly or subservient to the old reactionary, bossistic, bound-to-rule interests.

It was not to be expected that a perfect primary law could come rolling out of the box at the first shot. But one thing is to be hoped for from such a first attempt, and that is the establishing of the vital principles involved.

There are two principles involved in the Minnesota law as it stands: The election of national convention delegates by popular vote and the designation of the presidential condidate whom the State prefers.

Neither of these things is as foolish or as futile as the critics of the law have tried to make out. The voters of the State most assuredly have the right to say who they want to represent them and what they want them to do. Some indication of what the bosses would like to do is to be seen in the emphasis with which they denounce the law designed to prevent them from doing it. Of course the law is offensive to them.

So far as the principles involved in the law are concerned they are correct, but there may be some ground for criticism in the manner of their application. For example, Minnesota is asked to express a preference on presidential nominees long before the field of candidates has definitely developed. This is bound to endanger the ultimate satisfaction to be derived from an expression of preference at this time.

Another criticism might lie against present ambiguity regarding the obligation resting upon delegates to support the State's preference in the national convention. How many ballots are necessary to "faithfully carry out the wishes and preferences of the voters" as the law provides?

Neither one of these things vitally affects the real principles underlying the law; they are mere matters of detail. If Minnesota voters honestly desire to unseat bossism and run their own politics they will jealously guard the principles involved in this law and tackle the job of adjusting the details so that they may serve rather than hamper the operation of the plan. Even as the law stands to-day it is a serious question if it doesn't afford a cleaner, fairer, squarer means of selecting delegates than was possible under the old method of hand-picked, boss-managed, and boss-delivered delegations.

WHY CALL IT A FARCE?

There was never a political convention held in Minneapolis that was attended by upward of 3,000 delegates. In 1912 there were 1,078 voting delegates in the Republican national convention. There was no criticism that this number was not sufficiently large thoroughly to represent all the Republicans in the entire country.

On Tuesday Minnesota held its first presidential primary. There was apparently very little interest. The vote was extraordinarily light, so small in fact that the critics of the plan went about on Wednesday mentioning the fact as final proof of the shopworn charge that "the presidential primary is a farce."

The primary is a substitute for a party convention. In Minneapolis there were 3,169 votes cast on the Republican side alone.

If 1,078 delegates are enough to represent all the Republicans in the United States, it certainly would seem safe to assume that 3,169 could fairly represent all the Republicans in Minneapolis. Representativeness is the big thing to be desired in any nominating body. Small as the Tuesday vote was, it was infinitely more representative than any convention vote could have been, and the beauty of it lays in the fact that it was untrammeled.

Next time anybody tries to tell you that Minnesota's presidential primary law is a "failure and a farce," call for specifications and see if they weigh much as against the above setting out of facts.

[From the Chicago American, Feb. 25, 1916.]

A CONCERTED ATTACK ON THE DIRECT PRIMARY LAW—BOSSES SEEM SINCERE IN SCHEME TO OVERTHROW PEOPLE—TIME FOR DEFENSE NOW.

To those who closely read the record of daily events and who by putting this and that together manage to get a glimpse of large political patterns, it is quite apparent that there is now afoot a concerted movement to bring about a repeal of the Illinois direct primary law.

Will it succeed?

One of the good effects of the present law is that it has helped to so differentiate the political influence of the party machines that those who wish to carry out any reactionary scheme in government must go into print or mount the platform and try to convince the public.

This is a much harder and slower job than the old way. Formerly all that was necessary to be done in order to control nominations and later control elections and legislation was to get some sort of agreement between a few superbosses and have them send the necessary decree down the line!

To-day candidates and public officials, with a lively appreciation of the direct primary campaign and the inevitable sifting of candidates' records that goes with it, are not nearly so manageable as they used to be. They are aware of the people!

For this reason the enemies of the direct primary must now send out their paid penmen and spellbinders and try to convert the voters of Illinois to the notion that it would be a good thing for them if they will consent to abandon this important part of their political privileges.

The arguments of the penmen and spellbinders will hardly be convincing.

They claim that the direct primary is costly.

This is true—but so is every other institution of popular government; and, after all, the cost of primary elections is not nearly so great as the old spoils system, which was incubated and nourished to an evil maturity under the régime of the bosses and their hand-picked conventions. There is no way of computing the enormous loot wrested from the people of Illinois through the old boss system.

They will argue that the majority of voters don't care for the primary elections and won't attend them.

In answer to this we may cite the enormous primary vote cast at the mayoralty primary in Chicago a year ago and call attention to the increasing interest in primary elections wherever the law exists. And it may be added, however small a primary vote may be, there are always enough electors at the polls to make the boss's job sweaty and doubtful—hence their anxiety to get the law out of the way.

They say, too, that the people don't make good nominations; are not capable of choosing the best candidates, as conventions would.

No specifications are given, and the assertion must go for what it is worth, which is but little. The charge belongs in the same class with those which were made by the reactionaries when our Federal Constitution was being formed. The Philistines then claimed that the people were not fit to vote at elections. Now they say the people are not capable of making nominations.

No doubt there are several particulars in which the primary law should be amended, not decapitated.

The order of filing petitions to place the names of candidates on the primary ballot should be so changed that there will be no invitation to fraud and disgraceful scrambling.

The percentage of voters' names on petitions should be considerably increased in many cases so that it will not be so easy for irresponsible people to get on the primary ballot for the purpose of getting off again—for a consideration.

The two-year limitation in changing party affiliations might very reasonably be reduced to one year or to the last preceding election. This would encourage political independence, which is the rational thing.

So amended the law is, and increasingly will be, an instrument of political purification and civic progress and will exactly fit in with other electoral reforms now being produced all over the country, a movement to restore to the people every essential function of their government.

But the people of Illinois must be alive to the direct primary issue. They must not indulge in passivity until it is too late.

The bosses are evidently serious in their schemes to overthrow the people's primaries. Let the people be equally serious in defending.

MINNESOTA TO REPEAL PRIMARY—FEAR PEOPLE MAY TAKE OLD PARTIES AWAY FROM GANG IN 1920.

The Minnesota Legislature, controlled by the Burnquist State administration and composed of a majority in both houses hostile to the Nonpartisan League and organized labor, is preparing to destroy the democratic election procedure of the State in an attempt to head off the expected victory of the farmer-labor forces in 1920. The Republican politicians had a narrow escape in the recent Minnesota primaries, when the Republican candidate for governor, indorsed by the farmer-labor forces, nearly defeated Gov. Burnquist. It has, therefore, been determined to change the primary law before the next election in order to prevent a farmer-labor indorsed Republican from getting the nomination in 1920.

A bill has already passed the house by a vote of 78 to 51 which abolishes the direct primary law of the State, so far as party nominations for governor and State officers are concerned. The bill is scheduled to pass the senate.

For many years Minnesota has had direct primaries. The rank and file of party memberships in the State have chosen the party candidates by direct vote. This procedure is swept away by the proposed new law, which provides for a return to the old party convention system, the scandal of American politics for several decades.

This move, it is hoped, will enable party bosses to control the nominations for State offices, thus preventing the rank and file of party organizations from nominating men indorsed by the farmer-labor or other progressive combines. It is expected by the legislative bosses that this will force the farmer-labor forces to come out as a third party, thus preventing them from using their strength as a balance of power in the old parties.

OBJECT LESSON TO PEOPLE.

This attack on the direct primary for the purpose of intrenching gang rule in Minnesota will on the whole have a good effect. It has fully demonstrated the rule-or-ruin tactics of the present State gang. Very naturally, after many years fighting to obtain direct primaries, the people of Minnesota do not relish having this democratic election system taken away from them simply to give the reigning politicians a supposed advantage over the progressive forces of the State.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
March 28, 1916.

Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
Minneapolis, Minn.

MY DEAR MR. LUNDEEN: I have yours of the 17th instant and appreciate it very much. All the slurs and attacks that are now going the rounds of the press respecting the principle of the primary as opposed to the caucus and convention will have no effect. The primary is here to stay, and although it has its weakness it is so much better than the caucus and convention that intelligent people will never return to the old plan.

I know what sort of fight you had in Minnesota, and I shall never cease to be grateful to you and those like you who stood by me.

Yours, cordially,

ALBERT B. CUMMINS.

HON. JEROME F. DONOVAN,
OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to present for your consideration a bill (H. R. 16190) to punish the use of mails to promote fraudulent enterprises in the guise of war charities or patriotic organizations.

This bill is a bill that is being projected and hoped of passage owing to the conditions which prevailed by reason of the experience that the district attorney's office, under District Attorney Swann, of New York County, has had relative to war charities.

A great many of the welfare people of that city, as through the country, gave their services and means toward charitable objects for the benefit of the American forces here and overseas, and vast sums of money were collected for that purpose. There were many organizations incorporated; drives were made for the collection of funds; and the success of the drives was marvelous, the collections amounting to millions of dollars.

It soon developed that many people were engaged in this enterprise for personal gain and profit through misrepresentation and fraud. District Attorney Swann was the recipient of many complaints from donors that in their opinion funds were being collected through fraud and were not being appropriated for the purposes represented. This occasioned him to make an investigation, and he assigned Assistant District Attorney Edwin P. Kilroe to take charge of the matter. For a year Mr. Kilroe devoted his entire time to the matter, with the result that 26 indictments were had and 6 or 8 of these people are now serving time in the State prison and the balance indicted are awaiting trial.

Mr. Kilroe has compiled an extensive report covering the entire subject which explains in detail how lucrative this graft has been and to what extent the charity and generosity of the people has been preyed upon. For your further consideration I will now present part of the report referred to:

REPORT ON THE INVESTIGATION OF WAR CHARITIES.

[By Edwin P. Kilroe, assistant district attorney, New York, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1919.]

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 1, 1919.

Hon. EDWARD SWANN,
District Attorney, New York County, New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: On November 16, 1917, you directed me to make a comprehensive investigation of the methods and measures employed in raising and disbursing funds for war charities or war-relief work in New York City. The investigation, which has continued for a period of approximately 14 months, is completed, and I desire to submit to you the following brief exposition of the salient features revealed:

Five hundred and thirty-four committees, societies, organizations, "funds," or "charities" were investigated and their accounts, vouchers, and books carefully audited and inspected; 1,583 witnesses were examined and 947 statements were taken, covering 3,454 typewritten pages, legal cap size; 2,472 letters were received and answered; 4,463 queries were received by telephone, by correspondence, or in person, and replies given thereto. A comparative study of the financial methods employed in war-relief work in other cities and States was also made, and, in order that the scope of the investigation might be as broad as possible, attention was given to the methods in vogue in foreign countries.

Since the outbreak of the world war, in the midsummer of 1914, it has been estimated that no less than 20,000 agencies, of one class or another, have been engaged in war-relief work in the United States, and that of this number at least 7,500 operated during some period of their activity in the city of New York. It is said that there are now at work in this city over 1,500 different war charities. The amount raised in the United States by these charities, either in money or in goods, has been conservatively estimated at from $3,000,000,000 to $4,000,000,000, and it may be said with confidence that upward of three-fifths, or 60 per cent, of this amount was raised in New York City.

At the very inception of the investigation it was revealed that no degree of uniformity in purpose, conception, or execution was to be found, and that the field of war-relief work in the United States presented a vast jungle of forms and fancies as various as the human imagination might suggest. As the investigation progressed certain stratifications of motive, method, and execution began to be outlined. The immense returns obtained through these ill organized and wholly unofficial channels suggested at once the opportunity for fraud, profiteering, mismanagement, and inefficiency; and, at the same time, brought to light the tremendous generosity with which the public at large had given and were blindly giving to the worthy causes promoted at once by the sincere worker and the deliberate fraud. Of especial interest was the revelation of the character and prominence of the patrons of the various individual activities, and the gullible or careless ease with which persons of prominence lent their names, in many instances without either judgment or investigation, to activities conceived and promoted often by ex-convicts, confidence men, adventurers, and social parasites.

This form of activity was hit upon at once by "climbers," who saw an opportunity for social recognition and preferment in the advertisement and popular approval that would follow from their ostentatious philanthropy and patriotism. Many people of this type, possessed of considerable fortunes, and therefore without venal motive, but wholly devoid of experience or adaptability for the form of work undertaken, saw in the field a prospect of governmental recognition, commendation, or even official honor or decoration. To these various types of apparent respectability the legal and social outcast attached himself, and thus fortified preyed upon the prestige and public influence so obtained to mulct the patriotic and the generous and waste and dissipate the national benevolence. In many instances it was discovered that the names of persons of unimpeachable character and integrity were exploited for selfish purposes, wholly without their consent or even knowledge; but by far the greater vice lay in the use of the names of prominent and worthy persons as directors, committee members, and patrons, whose approval and consent were actually given without sufficient and in many cases with no investigation as to the character of those who managed the activity and handled and disbursed the funds. It was found that well-intending men and women of prominence, of unquestioned sincerity, and philanthropic character, while lending the venal imposter their cloak of respectability, wholly neglected their duties of public stewardship and failed utterly to give the proper and in many cases no measure of supervision to the methods, either of collection or disbursement, employed by the self-appointed agent. Thus recommended to the public confidence, and unrestrained either by check or conscience, the swindler and the profiteer proceeded to gorge themselves from the outpourings of the generous public purse.

Worthy committees, under the plea of necessity and in their eagerness to obtain returns for laudable objects, were induced to enter into unconscionable contracts with solicitors, whose percentages ranged from 40 per cent to 85 per cent, and to undertake, without judgment or foresight, the expenditure of vast sums of money for overhead expenses, advertising, and other forms of exploitation, without a view either to the amount of expense incurred or the proportion that it might bear to the eventual return. It followed necessarily that out of the three or four billion dollars raised for war relief in the United States since the outbreak of the war a large percentage found its way into the pockets of the professional socilitors, who worked solely on a percentage basis, and through the medium of whose efforts funds were largely solicited and received. In their eagerness to secure some return for the activity undertaken, committees and organizers winked at this method, and the contributing public was gulled into supposing that its gifts were finding their way directly into the hands of the suffering and needy; and the promoters and solicitors were little concerned in the motives or expectations of the donors or with the call of the worthy and needy sufferers in whose cause they ostensibly labored. Ambitious public functions, with the glamour of social, patriotic, and philanthropic dedication, were organized and undertaken by the well-meaning dilletanti. Large attendances were secured and considerable sums devoted in support by the unwary; and after the tinsel and the glamour were brushed aside, an accounting had, and obligations paid, a mere pittance remained for the benefit of the war sufferer.

Deliberate theft played its part in rifling the war-relief chest, but because of the impossibility of checking up either the amounts contributed or the disbursements made, the exact amount of the moneys stolen can never be definitely ascertained. From the facts revealed, however, it may be fairly estimated that the amounts stolen in the city of New York for a period of 12 months prior to the starting of the investigation exceeds $3,000,000. The wastage due to inefficiency, mismanagement, and duplication of effort is likewise impossible of accurate ascertainment, but from the enormous discrepancy between the amounts collected and the amounts apparently dedicated to the announced object of charities, where figures were obtainable, it is not unfair to say that the wastage amounted to as much as 65 per cent of the moneys collected.

The principal vices revealed in the course of the investigation are, briefly, as follows:

(1) The payment of commissions to solicitors and collectors.

(2) Soliciting funds, selling buttons, tags, and merchandise on the streets and in public places, conveyances, and places of amusement.

(3) The remit or return method of raising money; that is, the form of solicitation for funds, where trinkets, souvenirs, or other forms of merchandise are forwarded to charitably inclined persons with the request that either a donation be remitted or that the article be returned—a form of exploitation inuring to the benefit of profiteering manufacturers.

(4) The payment of large, often exorbitant, salaries to executives and promoters.

(5) The conduct of public entertainments and bazars at enormous outlay and small return.

(6) The failure to keep adequate accounts and to provide audit and supervision.

(7) The failure to prepare budgets and to fix plan and scope.

(8) The failure to provide an active board of directors to supervise and direct the activities of the society or charity.

(9) The organization and maintenance of societies or charities without a definite purpose or object.

(10) Unnecessary and wasteful duplication of activities by societies competing for funds for the same or similar ends.

(11) Lack of business methods and efficiency in conduct and management.

(12) Inadequate equipment both in facilities and personnel for the work undertaken.

Upon a survey of the vast amount of data collected and from the statements of the numerous witnesses examined, the various forms of activities devoted to war relief work may be classified, with a view to their character and usefulness, under the following heads:

(1) Worthy war-relief work, honestly and efficiently conducted, where a respectable percentage of the funds secured are appropriated to the avowed objects.

(2) Wasteful activities pursued for a worthy object by people of integrity in which, through lack of business method, ability, or experience, insufficient or grossly inadequate returns were made to the object avowed.

(3) Ill-conceived or absurd activities, ofttimes well intended, from which no benefits accrued to a worthy end.

(4) Profiteering enterprises of ostensibly philanthropic purposes but frequently conducted for the personal profit or preferment of the promoters and managers.

(5) "The One Hundred Per Cent Boys," an out-and-out thievery, where every cent collected was misappropriated and stolen.

Since the investigation was concerned chiefly with frauds and abuses, activities classified under the first of the foregoing headings have no appropriate place in this report. The remaining four classifications, however, are worthy of a brief word of comment, with a descriptive sketch of a typical example in each class.

I. The "One Hundred Per Cent Boys."

The One Hundred Per Cent Boys were a coterie of charity workers who collected in the name of a charitable enterprise and appropriated to their own use the entire proceeds. The leader of this clique was Michael J. Delehunty, and with him were associated William J. F. O'Neill, Alfred Gardner, James Mendels, and John Davis. They began their activities in the charity fields as solicitors for advertising concerns who had taken contracts on a commission basis to furnish advertising for souvenir programs at benefits for the relief of the families and dependents of various regiments, chief among which were the Twelfth, Fourteenth, Seventy-first, Sixty-ninth, and the Ninth Coast Defense. The men had arrangements with advertising contractors on a basis of 25 per cent to 40 per cent of the advertisements and contributions solicited. They soon, however, developed into the 100 per cent class.

They had desk room in an office at 500 Fifth Avenue, where most of the solicitations were made by telephone. Their scheme of operation is best illustrated in the cases of Delehunty, Winkelman, and O'Neill, which typify their general method of operation. In the Delehunty case, Walter J. M. Donovan, a real estate broker, residing at 276 Riverside Drive, New York City, with an office at 80 Broadway, was called up on the telephone on October 1, 1917, by Delehunty.

Delehunty's testimony at Winkelman's trial is:

"I called on the telephone. I told him it was Col. Conley; that we were getting up a benefit for the Fighting Sixty-ninth. I asked Mr. Donovan if he would subscribe, and Mr. Donovan said: 'Yes'; he would be very glad to. He said: 'It's rather psychological at this time that just at this time I am writing to the Sixty-ninth.' And he said to me: 'Before I subscribe I would like to have you do me a favor. I would like to have you furnish me with the names of three dependent families of this regiment.' I answered, 'Yes'; and he said he would subscribe $1,000; and I said, 'I will send for it'; so that was the end of the conversation."

At 1 o'clock on October 2, 1917, Delehunty called at the office and received a check for $1,000. The check was then taken by Delehunty to Schermerhorn's or Proctor's café at No. 5 Beaver street, where James Mendels, Delehunty's partner, indorsed the name of Col. Louis D. Conley, in the presence of Lester L. Winkelman. They then went to Jack's restaurant on Forty-second Street and Sixth Avenue, where they met Maurice Manheimer, a bookmaker, to have the check cashed. Manheimer gave the check to another bookmaker named William J. Byrne, who in turn gave the check to a third bookmaker named David R. Goldie, who deposited the check on the 4th day of October, 1917, in the Commercial Trust Co. of New York.

After waiting a week or 10 days for the check to clear through the bank, Goldie passed the money for the check to Byrne, who in turn gave it to Manheimer; Manheimer in turn gave it to Winkelman, and Winkelman gave $850 to Delehunty, deducting 15 per cent for cashing the check. Delehunty thereupon split the proceeds, or $850, with his partner, Mendels, each taking $425.

In the O'Neill case the money was solicited in the name of the Ninth Coast Defense Command of the New York Coast Artillery of the National Guard of the State of New York. On October 8, 1917, John H. Steele, a lawyer, who lives at 410 Park Avenue, and has an office at 120 Broadway, was called at his office on the telephone by O'Neill, who stated to Steele that he was Sergt. Harris, of the Ninth Coast Defense, and that they were getting up a fund for the dependents of the men of their regiment, asking if he could send one of their young men down to see him about it. Mr. Steele made an appointment with the man speaking over the telephone, and shortly after the conversation O'Neill called and presented a letter, purporting to have been signed by W. W. Marks, captain, and told Mr. Steele that he had come in pursuance of the conversation had with Sergt. Harry Harris over the telephone. The letter presented read as follows:

"October 8, 1917.

"Mr. J. H. Steele,
"120 Broadway, New York City.

"My Dear Mr. Steele: This will serve to introduce the bearer, W. F. F. O'Neill, who is helping our campaign committee to raise sufficient funds to take care of the boys who are away. Any courtesy or assistance rendered will be kindly appreciated.

"Yours, very truly,

"W. W. Marks.

"Please make your check payable to Sergt. Harry Harris; the same will be acknowledged from headquarters."

Upon the receipt of the letter Mr. Steele drew a check for $50 payable to the order of Sergt. Harry Harris, and gave it to O'Neill. The check was subsequently cashed in the café of George J. Kuck, at 193 Seventh Avenue, by Davis, who was one of "the boys." It subsequently developed that the letter signed "Marks" was a forgery, and the indorsement of the name of Sergt. Harry Harris on the back of the check was also a forgery, and the proceeds were never received by the Ninth Coast Defense.

It also developed that on the 4th of October, 1917, four days prior to the obtaining of the check for the Ninth Coast Defense, Mr. Steele was called on the telephone by a person who stated that he was Col. Howlet, of the Fourteenth Regiment, and was soliciting for funds on behalf of the dependents of that regiment. Within an hour after he received this message O'Neill called on Mr. Steele and stated that he had called in pursuance to the conversation Col. Howlet had with him over the telephone, and that Col. Howlet had sent him there to get donations, either for the dependents of the soldiers or to furnish the soldiers with underclothing, socks, and shoes. O'Neill presented a letter purporting to have been signed by Col. Howlet asking that a contribution be made to the Fourteenth Regiment, and that checks be made payable to the order of Mrs. J. R. Howlet, the wife of Col. Howlet. Mr. Steele drew a check to the order of Mrs. J. R. Howlet and gave it to O'Neill, who thanked him for it, and said that "the regiment or the colonel would be much obliged." The signature of Col. Howlet on the letter, as well as the indorsement of Mrs. J. R. Howlet on the back of the check, was forged, and the check was cashed at Kuck's café by Davis, and not a single cent of the proceeds went to the Fourteenth Regiment.

The "boys" met daily in front of the Belmont Hotel, and frequently used the grill room of that establishment as a headquarters, and at times used the slot telephones of the New York Telephone Co., which adjoined the Belmont, as a basis of operation.

When they retired from the solicitor's vocation and "decided" to go into business for themselves they had solicitors' blanks printed on the stationery of the Seventy-first, Seventh, and Twelfth Regiments, respectively, for their own use. Upon these blanks were forged the orders or requests for money. The name of Col. Reginald R. Foster, of the Twelfth Regiment, was repeatedly forged on checks and on requests for funds.

"The boys," from February 1, 1917, when their activities began in New York City, until the middle of December, 1917, when they were detected, had taken from the public approximately the sum of $500,000 for war relief work, not one penny of which went toward the object for which it was contributed. Forgeries without number were committed, and the checks cashed at Jack's restaurant, in cigar stores, and in well-known cafés.

Manheimer, the bookmaker, testified that he had cashed, or caused to be cashed, over 50 checks, in amounts varying from $15 to $1,000. James McCallion, alias James Sanders, a bookmaker and betting commissioner, stated that he had cashed for "the boys" over 100 checks, ranging in value from $25 to $750; and Lester Winkelman admitted, when he took the stand on his own behalf, that he had cashed for Delehunty and his associates upward of 25 checks, in amounts varying from $25 to $750. Delehunty stated that the greater part of this money was lost on races, and that "the boys" usually played the "long shots" and lost; and what was not spent on the races was spent in expensive cafés along the "Great White Way" on ladies, wine, and entertainment.

"The boys" had marshaled their methods in a remarkable way. They had a card index, known as a "suckers' list," of well-known residents of New York City who were known to be liberal to charity, and on each card was an annotation of a peculiar characteristic or weakness of the person mentioned on the card. For example, a well-known financier, who was classified by "the boys" as "a hard-boiled egg" before the war, changed entirely in his philanthropic habits after members of his immediate family had joined the colors; and it became no effort for "One Hundred Per Cent Boys" to get a contribution from him; in fact, Mr. Delehunty, while in the Tombs awaiting sentence, after entering a plea of guilty, offered to wager that if he were permitted to go to the office of the financier mentioned, accompanied by a plain-clothes man, he could get a check for $2,500 without difficulty.

Delehunty is a man of more than ordinary intelligence, possessed of considerable shrewdness, craft, business tact, and diplomacy; he was the leader of the coterie. In a statement issued by him to the press after he had pleaded guilty, he said that New York City was the mecca for graft. His interesting statement reads as follows:

"Every road led to Easy Street. It was the easiest graft I ever engaged in. Every person you met fell and fell hard. It was easier than picking up rocks along the Palisades. I don't know exactly how much I collected, but I got a whole lot, something in the neighborhood of $150,000, should say, and every bit of it went fast. It was a case of 'easy come, easy go.' I wasn't the only one doing it. The dead-sure men came on from all over the country to New York. It had gone forth that the graft was easy, and the town was soon filled with 'con' men. That's what spoiled the game. Some of the 'low brows,' who had been satisfied with $25 a day, found that they could make $1,000 safely but still wanted more. They didn't appear to be satisfied, and started in to use sledge-hammer methods. They blackjacked right and left, with the result that the graft was soon put on the bum. The people soon began to 'sit up and take notice.' New York is full of business men that make money too fast. They know all the angles of their own game and business. You could not take money away from them with a gatling gun in their own game, and yet they are the biggest suckers alive. They're so soft that I just couldn't resist the temptation to play upon their patriotism. When I was soliciting funds for one of the legitimate charities I saw in a minute how easy and careless these rich men were."

"Doc." Waterbury, alias Julius L. Ford, was a charity worker of the type of "the One Hundred Per Cent Boys," although he was not closely associated with the coterie known by that name.

Waterbury was born on a little farm near Ithaca, N. Y., and was educated at Cornell. He spent a term in State prison for larceny and then took up charity work. He specialized in solicitations for war books, records of soldiers' experiences, photographs, and general press work, and as a side line was always ready to take up anything in which he could garner a dollar.

At the Leonard-Britton prize fight, which was held in New York City on October 22, an appeal was made from the ring for funds for the war relief, known as the "Le Bien etre du Blesse," for the benefit of the French wounded. An announcement was made and contributions were asked for. Large sums were volunteered. Among others, a motion-picture promoter donated $500, and a man, who was afterwards identified as "Doc." Waterbury, said, "I will give $250," whereupon he and several others passed among the audience collecting money in a hat. Waterbury collected a sum estimated at $700 or $800 and failed to stop at the box office with it.

He is now under indictment on the charge of obtaining $1,000 from a wealthy Philadelphian for war relief work which he appropriated to his own use. There are other charges also pending against him.

Eugene Jess, of 638 St. Ann's Avenue, Bronx, whose real name is Jesselman, worked independently from the other members of the One Hundred Per Cent Boys, but his system was the same. He solicited contributions in the name of the Red Cross and requested the donors to draw their checks to order of Mrs. Maude Shanley, "a well-known society woman." Mrs. Shanley, who was used as a dummy by Jess in his transactions, was said to be the wife of a saloonkeeper in Harlem. She indorsed the checks and turned them over to Jess, who cashed them and put the money in his pocket. Jess was indicted, convicted, and sentenced to State prison. Mrs. Shanley is now under indictment as an accomplice of Jess.

Frederick J. Remsen, an ex-convict, is another charity worker who used the One Hundred Per Cent Boys' methods. On October 3, 1917, he solicited $500 from the United States Industrial Alcohol Co., of which Mr. H. L. Rubens is president, for the Army and Navy bazaar. The check was made payable to the order of Edward S. Moore, secretary and treasurer of the Army and Navy bazaar; his indorsement was forged and the check was cashed in a café in the financial district. Within two weeks after Remsen had received this check from Mr. Rubens, he solicited and received another check for $500 from Mr. Rubens's company for an advertisement in the Tammany Times. The proceeds of both checks were appropriated by Remsen, who is now under indictment and awaiting trial on both charges.

The One Hundred Per Cent Boys have been completely suppressed. The members have been either sent to prison or are fugitives from justice. Winkelman is serving a sentence in Sing Sing Prison of not less than three years nor more than six years. O'Neill is serving a sentence of not less than two and a half nor more than four years and six months; Michael J. Delehunty was sentenced to not less than three nor more than six years, but because of his valuable services to the people in securing the indictment and conviction of his associates and in giving information which led to the suppression of the One Hundred Per Cent Boys he was subsequently released on parole; Jess has served his sentence.

II. The Waster Type of Charity.

THE ARMY AND NAVY BAZAAR.

The Army and Navy Bazaar was the first war relief activity to attract by its irregularities the attention of the public press and to come under the investigation of the district attorney. From the accounts published in the daily papers in November, 1917, it was apparent that the Army and Navy Bazaar, which was held at the Grand Central Palace from October 27 to November 3, 1917, was a palpable fraud upon the public.

The bazaar was held to raise money for the Army and Navy field comfort committee; the object of the committee was to provide the soldiers and sailors with comfort kits, which would cost approximately $1 apiece. Out of $72,000, which was taken from the public by the bazaar, only $645 was actually available for the purchase of comfort kits. Among the items of deduction from the fund we might mention the following enormous overhead or operating expenses:

Commissions on advertising and printing of the souvenir program	$24,060.30
Rent of the Grand Central Palace, two floors	18,000.00
Press agents	6,393.68
Decorations	3,998.85
Policing the show	1,218.15
Stationery	1,201.00

The Army and Navy Bazaar was under the immediate direction of Waldemar H. F. N. De Billie, who describes himself as an "expert in exploitation and publicity." Before coming to New York, De Billie, who was the son of a doctor and was born at New Orleans, had an interesting career across the continent, where he tried his hand at staging various entertainments, shows, and bazaars, most of which resulted in failures and losses to everyone except De Billie.

De Billie undertook the management of the Army and Navy Bazaar on a 50–50 per cent basis; that is to say, he was to receive 50 per cent of the net proceeds, but by a subsequent contract the amount he might obtain was limited to $7,500.

The souvenir journal or program was farmed out to an advertising solicitor named George F. Sweeney on a 50–50 per cent basis. The advertisers paid a handsome price for space in the program, and in a great many instances where merchants were asked to advertise they gave donations instead. These donations were classed by Sweeney as advertisements and 50 per cent of the amounts so donated was taken by him. Occasionally the advertiser would be represented in the journal by a mere line, such as "Compliments of a friend." The moneys received in this way from 16 persons alone amounted to $6,000. Among those who contributed in this manner was Christopher Hannevig (Inc.), of 139 Broadway, who paid $1,000. In return for the money thus paid he was given the last page on the program, with the simple insertion, "Compliments of C. H.," and $500 of this money went to Sweeney.

In soliciting donations and advertisements the public were led to believe that the money was going entirely for war relief work. In soliciting a donation from the Aero Club of America, De Billie wrote, "Of course, you doubtless understand all of the money taken in is for charity. There are no splits or commissions of any sort."

The Army and Navy field comfort committee, under whose auspices the bazaar was held, had headquarters in the Hotel McAlpin. Including the $645 which was turned over to the committee by the bazaar management, the Army and Navy field comfort committee since its organization in July, 1917, took in approximately $14,000. Ten thousand dollars of this sum went for expenses and only 300 comfort kits had been bought, although a total of nearly $85,000 had been solicited from the public for comfort kits by this committee through its bazaar and in other ways. Upon the district attorney's request the committee wound up its affairs and turned over the money on hand to the American Red Cross.

Sweeney, the advertising solicitor, who collected in advertising and donations $45,000, received as his share approximately $22,500. He was indicted for forgery and larceny.

Christian Donald Fox, whose right name was Charles David Fox, and who signed himself as C. Donald Fox, was the secretary of the Army and Navy comfort committee; he was also interested in other charity activities, having been associated with the Louise Glaum War Luxury Fund. He was indicted for forgery and larceny in connection with collections made on behalf of the Army and Navy comfort committee. He pleaded guilty and was sentenced to the penitentiary for three years; he is still in prison.

THE AMERICAN AMBULANCE IN RUSSIA.

The American Ambulance in Russia is a notable instance of the misappropriation of funds, lack of ordinary business system, and inadequate supervision in war-relief activities.

This charity was organized early in 1916 by Hamilton Fish, jr., who acted as its chairman until October, 1917, when he was called to the colors; the society had an office at 527 Fifth Avenue. The records kept were meager and incomplete. Mail was opened by clerks, and there was no system of checking the moneys received and expended. An attempt was made to raise money on behalf of the ambulance fund in the State of Illinois, but under a statute of that State it was necessary to file an audited statement with the council of defense, and, accordingly, on the 31st of August, 1917, an audit was prepared. An accountant or bookkeeper was engaged, who gathered together such data as he could from slips of paper, letterheads, correspondence, backs of envelopes, and deposit books. The firm of Marwick, Mitchell, Peat & Co., chartered accountants, prepared the audited account from the meager data thus furnished by the bookkeeper.

We find in the audited account issued by that firm the following remarkable statement: "The records available were insufficient to ascertain therefrom the total contributions received. * * * We were unable to trace the source of those contributions. * * *" The statement then proceeded to unfold the facts that the contributions were traced from letters of organizations holding benefits, bazaars, etc., from contributors' letters and cards, and from the bank's deposit books, and from miscellaneous office memoranda. In the audited statement we find the following entries: "Source not traceable, $16,368.35"; "Contribution account reflects a transcript from bank statement of deposits. This was because only a rough set of books was installed and the books were insufficient to furnish the necessary detail."

The audited statement, therefore, in reality only shows the amount of money deposited and does not indicate the actual amount of money received from February 19, 1916, when the charity was instituted, to August 31, 1917, the last date of the report. Under the caption entitled "Disbursements" the statement shows the following remarkable entry under the heading of miscellaneous items: "For autos and medical supplies, $10,780.94, for which no invoice could be located." The audit ends with the statement that the accounting for contributions and disbursements was sadly neglected and with the suggestion that people of authority should supervise the receiving and disbursing of funds.

The society had a contract with Morton L. Palmer, an advertising man who resides at Stamford, Conn., and with a place of business at 432 Fourth Avenue. Under the terms of this contract Palmer was to receive 50 per cent of the moneys he solicited. This money, however, he did not keep entirely for himself; for some unexplained reason 10 per cent of the moneys he received was paid to one William Stoermer, who signed himself as "Managing director of field service." While Palmer has disclaimed any responsibility in the management of the affairs of the American Ambulance, he nevertheless was listed in the New York telephone directory under the following heading: "American Ambulance Field Service in France," with an office at 432 Fourth Avenue, which is Palmer's private office.

Palmer's scheme was to give a moving-picture show and at the show to make an appeal for funds. The show consisted of moving pictures depicting alleged scenes in Russia, with a scene in Petrograd during the first revolution. A lecture would first be given, followed by a recitation by a prominent actress. The local expense of the shows was borne by the patrons and patronesses, who furnished the hall in which the entertainment took place and who also supplied the ushers, who were usually Boy Scouts and young society girls, dressed as nurses. How much money was raised in this way it is impossible to state, but Palmer, in a statement made in the district attorney's office on December 12, 1917, states that on the Connecticut tour alone, which only lasted a few weeks, he raised $17,169.78, 10 per cent of which went to Mr. Stoermer and 40 per cent went to Palmer.

The shows were given under the name of the American Allied Ambulances, and the money was presumed to have been divided equally between the American Ambulance in Russia and the American Ambulance in Italy. A Mrs. Thomas Shields Clark, of Lenox, Mass., gave a check for $1,600 to buy an ambulance for use in Italy. This check, however, was turned over to the American Ambulance in Russia, and when this fact came to her attention she immediately demanded that the money be returned to her, which was done after considerable publicity.

Another method of collecting funds was by the use of an ambulance and a stretcher. An ambulance would be stationed at Forty-second Street and Fifth Avenue, or on some other congested corner; a young lady dressed in a Russian uniform would be in charge, and a stretcher would be laid on the sidewalk, into which money was thrown by people passing by. The men in charge of the stretchers, C. Welsey Shedd and Garrett Demarest, became known in the public press as "The Ten Per Cent Boys."

Shedd was a free lance who deserted his wife and child in Boston, and Demarest was a young attorney at Hackensack, N. J.; they met accidentally in New York, and both drifted into charity work on a 10 per cent basis. They stated that their collections ran from $60 to $2,200 daily, and their share of the proceeds was 10 per cent each of the amounts collected. Their commissions in a month ran as high as $1,000 each. They reported that they turned the money into headquarters "to anyone who happened to be in the place." The money would be taken there in a grip or satchel and would be dumped out on a desk and turned over to a bookkeeper or the keeper of the office or whoever happened to be present. The money was often dumped into a drawer at night and left there until the next morning, when it is presumed it was counted and deposited in the bank.

So far as the district attorney's office has been able to ascertain, no entry was made on the books of the organization showing the amounts collected daily and the amounts paid to Shedd and Demarest in commissions. The information stated in this report concerning the amounts collected is based upon the notations and memoranda made by Shedd and Demarest on backs of envelopes and other disconnected notes. "The Ten Per Cent Boys" received their commissions each day at the close of business.

These collectors informed the district attorney that 30 per cent of the money so collected went to Stoermer, 10 per cent each to Shedd and Demarest, and the other 50 per cent went to the American Ambulance in Russia. It is said that Stoermer in turn divided the 30 per cent with Miss Edith K. Oswald, and there was a separate fund in the organization known as the "E. K. O. Film Fund." In justice to Miss Oswald, however, it may be said that she never received a cent from either Stoermer or the American Ambulance in Russia. This fact is admitted by both Stoermer and the officials of the Ambulance; the "E. K. O. Film Fund," as near as can be ascertained, was intended to be a charge upon the funds of the Ambulance for the use of film which were devised by Miss Edith K. Oswald, a young lady from California, who had made the arrangements with Stoermer and who was in the moving-picture business. One of the films was entitled, "The Invisible Enemy," a tuberculosis film, exhibited for the benefit of the American Ambulance in Russia. In order to exploit this film Mr. Stoermer had himself designated as "field committee director." The scheme was to travel through the country with an ambulance, exhibit the film, and make an appeal for funds. The American Ambulance in Russia was to pay all expenses, and 10 per cent of the gross income was to go to Stoermer, 20 per cent to Miss Edith K. Oswald (the owner of the film), and 10 per cent each to Shedd and Demarest. How much money was collected in this way and paid out to Shedd and Demarest or to Stoermer it is impossible to state, for there is no record of it. Both Stoermer and Miss Oswald state, however, that Miss Oswald never received a cent for the use of the films.

In soliciting funds little attention seems to have been paid to the truth of the statements made to the public when appeals were made. The correspondence shows that Hamilton Fish, jr., wrote to Andrew Carnegie soliciting a contribution and said, "The work of the American Ambulance in Russia is accomplished with practically no overhead charges. Therefore all the money that is contributed will go for buying automobiles and surgical supplies. The Russian Government provides for the maintenance of the machines and supplies the gasoline." Upon the receipt of this communication Mr. Carnegie gave $1,000. In the printed appeal issued by the society in 1917 we find the following remarkable statements:

"The American Ambulance in Russia is the only American organization working with the Russian Army. It consists of 50 ambulances and a field hospital and is doing active service in the Carpathian Mountains. * * * We take gladly one penny or a million pennies; every one will go directly to Russia, with no deduction, and will reach them in their hour of suffering."

On October 31, 1917, a letter was sent out making an appeal for funds in which a statement was made that "for two years the Ambulance had been saving lives in Russia," with the further statement that 30 ambulances had been sent to Russia and that "40 more of our cars are on the way."

An appeal was made to the Elks, New York Lodge No. 1, for funds, and in that appeal it was specifically stated that every cent of the money would be used for relief work. Accordingly a check for $684.65, the balance of an ambulance fund on hand with the Elks, was forwarded to the American Ambulance in Russia on October 1, 1917, and on October 4 the treasurer of that organization acknowledged receipt of the check and stated, "the funds that you have given us will be expended for a shipment which will leave for Archangel in three days, and you can be assured that in a few weeks your money will be translated into actual help for the Russian soldiers that are actually behind the firing line." At the time the check was solicited from the Elks the American Ambulance in Russia made the following statement in a letter to the Elks: "At the present time we have 48 ambulances in operation on the Russian front, constituting the only American unit engaged in field service." The investigation discloses that at no time did they have more than 19 ambulances in Russia, and in fact those were all the ambulances that were shipped, and of the sum that had been donated by the Elks 20 per cent, or $136.93, had been paid to Stoermer on the same day that the Elks' check was received, and on the stub of the check paying the money to Stoermer the following entry was made: "Elks Club, acquisition expenses."

Although Hamilton Fish, jr., had written to contributors that all the money contributed would go for buying automobiles and supplies, nevertheless we find in the audit the following interesting expense items: "Field administrative expenses, $7,432.87; circularization and administrative, $8,438.50." We also find such interesting entries as "Miss Clark's shirt, $6.21; decorations, $4.75; extra meals, $1.50; taxi to Ritz and return, Leydig, $5.90; dog booth, $125; Napoleon's Dream Book, $43" (Napoleon's Dream Book, we are informed, may be bought at any local book store at 25 to 50 cents a copy); "dinner for six, $24; October 22, mayor's dinner, $12.85; November 24, supper of party of five, car fares, tips, etc., $54.45."

It is said that an officer of the committee would carry around for days donation checks in his vest pocket, or leave them in correspondence baskets, pigeonholes, or drawers of his desk and forget about them until they were discovered some six or eight weeks later. On one occasion it is related that he came into the office and took out of his vest pocket pocket-worn checks, saying, "Here's some contributions I received, but I forgot to tell you about it."

The investigation disclosed that $275,635.13 had been raised by the Ambulance either in cash or in goods from the date of its organization in February, 1916. On December 6, 1917, however, there was a balance of $4,084.96 in the bank. So far as we could ascertain from the available records of the society, only $59,387.97 had been spent under the head of an automobile account, although the primary object of the fund was alleged to have been to supply ambulances in Russia, and the committee stated from time to time that the ambulances would be operated at the expense of the Russian Government.

The bills of lading would indicate that 38 ambulances had been shipped or were about to be shipped, although Dr. Newton, a member of the committee and the surgeon directly in charge of the field service, specifically states that only 19 ambulances had been actually shipped abroad. Dr. Newton further stated that 16 Studebaker cars had been bought but not shipped on account of the revolution. These ambulances, it was stated, were on hand in storehouses on December 6, 1917, awaiting shipping orders. One of the ambulances was loaned to the Fifteenth New York Infantry at Camp Upton by Hamilton Fish, jr., and a bill for $600 damages on the car while it was at Upton was paid from the ambulance fund. A Ford ambulance car, which cost $1,100, was loaned to the Army Field Service here in New York and worn out.

There was also a chauffeur's bill of $25 a week, which was charged to the Ambulance; the chauffeur's duties were to take the assistant treasurer in a Studebaker car from her home to her place of business, and then to see that she had proper recreation at night; it is said nightly trips were made to Coney Island and other near-by health resorts. It is also said that a bookkeeper, who also acted as chauffeur for one of the members of the committee, and whose salary was charged to the American Ambulance in Russia, spent some time during August and September, 1917, in a county up State in an effort to gain for his master control of a party at the September primaries. This fact was admitted by the chauffeur in an examination in the district attorney's office in January, 1918.

Among the entries of expenses is noted the item of a trip to Russia by the treasurer, accompanied by a chauffeur or ambulance driver named Nelson Fel. The expense of this trip was charged to the ambulance fund. A letter written by Mrs. E. Nelson Fel, of Warrenton, Va., mother of Nelson Fel, to Hamilton Fish, jr., was found among the letters of the society. The letter expressed great indignation because young Fel was not at the front but was spending his time "hitting the high spots in Petrograd and in Moscow." She stated in her letter, "He knows Petrograd and Moscow hotel life, and it is a rather useless and demoralizing life at his age. I fear that the experience will not be profitable to him, and he would have been more usefully employed at home." The treasurer of the organization received $3,250 from the Foreign Merchandising Corporation, of 233 Broadway, for looking after some of their business interests during the trip. He also received $1,250 from Charles A. Boylston, of 61 Broadway, and $1,100 from the American Ambulance; also $1,000 from John Moffitt, as president of the Russian War Relief Committee. Part of the last sum, however, was refunded on his return to this country. An additional sum of $695 was paid to him, which he said he advanced to Fel while in Russia. The latter sum was directed by the district attorney to be returned to the American Ambulance in Russia.

At the conclusion of the investigation the affairs of the American Ambulance in Russia were closed by the order of the district attorney, and approximately $5,000 on hand, together with the equipment, valued at about $35,000, was directed to be turned over to the American Red Cross. It would appear, therefore, that of the vast sums actually collected for the American Ambulance in Russia only a small part went for the purpose for which the donors intended it, since only 19 ambulances and a field hospital, which cost about $10,000, were actually supplied. The total amount of money actually expended on ambulances and on the field hospital was therefore in the neighborhood of $50,000.

MINOR EXAMPLES OF THE WASTER TYPE OF CHARITY.

The Army and Navy bazaar and the American Ambulance in Russia are the major examples of the waster type of war-relief work. Before passing from this phase of the investigation it may not be amiss to note the following minor examples of the same type:

(1) The Italian-American Society for the Relief of the Blind, the Mutilated, and the Orphans of the War: Money was raised by this organization by sending throughout the city collectors who carried a box bearing the insignia of the Red Cross, and approximately $1,500 was collected in this way, of which sum only $300 reached the war orphans and cripples. The collectors were working on a 25 per cent basis.

(2) The Italian-American Alliance bazaar: This bazaar was held at the Grand Central Palace on November 19, 1916. While $60,000 was collected from the public, only $13,000 was available for the war sufferers. The balance was dissipated in commissions, salaries, and exorbitant overhead expenses.

(3) The American Convalescent Home Association was conducted under the auspices of a cabaret dancer, who undertook to collect $500,000 for the purpose of establishing a home in France for American convalescent officers and officers on leave. A chateau was to be purchased as a headquarters, where officers were to be entertained by handsome, young, unmarried American girls. Moneys were collected by making appeals in restaurants, in taking up collections, and by the giving of entertainments. The exact amount raised by this scheme is unknown, but there is proof, however, that $500 to $600 was collected, but only $43 was available for the object of the enterprise; the balance, it is said, was spent by the youthful promoter on a trip to Palm Beach, where she went to recuperate after her efforts. The scheme was bitterly attacked by wives of officers in the service as scandalous; in one letter protesting against the enterprise an officer's wife wrote: "It seems to me that while in France there must be some officers' wives of the other allied armies capable of entertaining American officers without these unattached women hunting the job." The enterprise was abandoned at the request of the district attorney's office.

(4) The Holland-American Home for Belgium Widows and Orphans was conducted under the auspices of Miss Henrika A. C. Van der Flier, the daughter of a prominent official in Holland. She toured the country raising money, and on October 4, 1918, after nine months' efforts in this country, had succeeded in raising $9,595 at an expense of $8,028.

(5) The French restoration fund was a project conceived by the Countess Sartoris. The ostensible object of the fund was to restore part of devastated France. An examination into the accounts of the fund revealed the information that $9,000 had been raised at an expenditure of $7,000. At the request of the district attorney the work was discontinued.

III. PROFITEERING.

Profiteering in war-relief work, although manifesting itself in various forms and actuated by a variety of motives, may, nevertheless, be roughly defined as the exploitation of the patriotic public for private gain by devices which contribute some part of the net proceeds to charitable objects or operate exclusively to the advantage of the profiteer. The former class of cases embraces that variety of operations in which it is advertised or announced that a portion of the proceeds of the enterprise would be devoted to war-relief work. This form of profiteering, although usually done with the conscious expectation of private gain, was not without some degree of philanthropic spirit; while the latter form was commonly employed in cases where relief itself was exploited through the writing of a book or the solicitation of funds for personal relief upon some slight pretext to justify the appeal.

The following forceful denunciation of profiteering, issued by President Wilson, contains by implication both a definition and a remedy for this evil:

"Patriotism leaves profits out of the question. In these days of our supreme trial, when we are sending thousands and thousands of our young men across the seas to serve a great cause, no true man who stays behind to work for them and sustain them by his labor will ask himself what he is personally going to make out of that labor. No true patriot will permit himself to take toll of their heroism in money, or seek to grow rich by the shedding of their blood. * * * Profiteering that can not be got at by the restraints of conscience and love of country can be got at by taxation. There is such profiteering now, and the information with regard to it is available and indisputable."

PROFESSIONAL SOLICITING AND ADVERTISING.

The field of war-relief work proved a bonanza for the professional solicitor and advertiser. The privilege of soliciting donations for a particular fund or advertisements for special or souvenir journals and programs for benefits were farmed out to professionals. These parasites would immediately advertise for solicitors on a commission basis. It was shown that men and women of ill repute, those desperate both in morals and in fortune, flocked to these places and were set to work soliciting from the public without even the formality of an investigation; in fact, in some cases names and addresses were not taken before the solicitors were turned loose on the public. It is apparent that in numerous cases money thus collected was not even reported to headquarters.

In discussing the subject of bazaars and soliciting for charity, a leading advertising salesman in this city remarked:

"I recently met one of my former salesmen whom I had not seen for some time and found him to be the picture of opulence. I asked him what he was doing. He replied, 'I have one of the softest grafts in the world. I am putting on charity shows.' He went on to say that he had cleaned up $28,000 in six weeks from persons who had given his sweet girl solicitors money for tickets, which tickets the purchasers would not take because they could not attend the performances, and he said, 'There are numerous sources of income on the side, such as individual splits, advertising contracts, commissions, rebates, and padded expense accounts.'"

Methods of the most unscrupulous character were employed by the solicitors; prominent merchants in the city bearing German names were telephoned to or visited by them and were told that unless donations were received from them for certain benefits or advertising matter subscribed for their names would be reported to the United States Government as persons who ought to be interned.

Among the best-known charity advertising men and solicitors is Morton L. Palmer, already mentioned in connection with the American Ambulance in Russia. He moved in a select circle and addressed his appeals only to the wealthy; in his statement to the district attorney he said that he had collected $122,000 in one year for charity on a commission basis. He made a special trip across the continent for the American Ambulance Field Service in France and received all his expenses, $100 a week salary, and 1 per cent of the moneys collected. He admitted that he received a commission on $382,000 for his services on that trip, together with a salary and expenses, which netted him approximately $9,000 for 11 weeks' work. His annual net income from war-relief work was in the neighborhood of $20,000.

The activities of George F. Sweeney as an advertising solicitor have already been mentioned in connection with the Army and Navy Bazaar. Prior to his connection with the Army and Navy Bazaar he had worked for various war-relief societies in this city, sometimes on a salary and sometimes on a commission basis.

Another type of charity profiteering which may be classed under the head of advertising is the sale of space in newspapers to prominent men for the expression of patriotic sentiments. Typical of this is a scheme fathered by a Washington daily paper which engaged one Matt Glaser to solicit articles which were to be published in that newspaper under the title, "Greetings to the boys over there." The published article was to be prepared by a hack writer and signed by a man of prominence. For this privilege each contributor was charged from $100 to $500. The scheme was called to the attention of the editor of that paper, who immediately withdrew the proposition and stated that he did not realize that the work might be subject to criticism.

William Baxter, of We Boys fame (a notorious coterie of confidence men that had headquarters at the Hotel McAlpin), was a professional solicitor who early turned his attention to war-relief work. He was engaged by the American Defense Society on a commission basis ranging from 25 to 50 per cent; he succeeded in raising upward of $90,000 for that organization before his reputation became known to the officers of the society, when he was dismissed.

Forsyth & Fisk were an advertising and soliciting concern, with an office at 200 Fifth Avenue, that made a specialty of war-relief work. Their first venture in this field was a benefit at the Century Theater for the French and British war-relief work. That work was conducted on the basis of a 25–75 per cent division; that is, Forsyth & Fisk received 75 per cent of the proceeds and 25 per cent went to the relief fund. In January, 1917, they conducted a benefit for the Junior League, of which Mrs. Frances Riker is chairman, on a 33⅓–66⅔ per cent basis. In February, 1917, they conducted a benefit for the Mecca Temple on a 25–75 per cent basis, and in March, 1917, they conducted a benefit for the Southern Industrial and Educational Association on a 15–85 per cent basis; in that same month they also conducted a benefit for the National Defense Convention on a 25–75 per cent basis. They had a contract with the Seventy-first Regiment for a benefit held in September, 1917, on a 30–70 per cent basis. On the benefit given for the Sixty-ninth Regiment they had a 35–65 per cent contract, and for soliciting funds on behalf of the United States Boy Scouts in June, July, August, and September, 1917, they received 75 per cent of the amount collected. This firm conducted a benefit for the Fourteenth Regiment during the same year on a 50–50 basis. They collected approximately $30,000 in donations and in advertisements for the benefit of the Seventy-first Regiment and attempted to withhold 70 per cent of the donations as well as of the advertising money. An officer of the regiment, however, brought the matter to the attention of the district attorney and restitution was forced and the donations were turned over to the regiment without one cent deduction. When the district attorney began his investigation into war charities the firm of Forsyth & Fisk dissolved and quietly retired from business.

William Garland Brown was an advertising solicitor in business lines who found the charity field more lucrative. He worked for the National Emergency Relief Society, of which Mrs. William Cumming Story was president. As stated in another part of this report, he collected for this society on a "50-50" basis, after making arrangements with a member of the Story family to share the profits for influence in swinging the contracts with the society. He also operated under the name of "Brother Cie." One of his schemes was the sale of Bouchor's war paintings. He advertised that the profits would be distributed to the "La Protection du Reforme No. 2," and to promote the sales he organized a committee of respectable names under the title of "Committee for the Protection of French Soldiers Retired for Disability" and sold, or attempted to sell, books at $25 apiece. The arrangements on the profits were so made that after the overhead expenses, including Brown's commissions, were paid, the surplus, if any, went to the benefit of the charity indicated. In his appeals to the public he stated, "We are handling the work without profit. No commissions or percentages are paid to anyone." The expense arrangements, however, were so made that there would be little or no profit and hence there was little or no donation to charity. It was a business enterprise conducted in the name of charity. Mr. Brown also solicited advertisements and contributions for the American Defense Society, the Junior Naval Reserve, and other organizations. He died on September 2, 1918, from Spanish influenza.

Another advertising firm that made a specialty of war-relief work was the firm of Curry & Saunders, who were undoubtedly the most unscrupulous solicitors in the business. They made arrangements for program advertising and the soliciting of donations for any percentage they could obtain; and the percentages charged by them ran from 30 per cent to as high as 80 per cent. They had a contract on a 65 per cent basis with the Junior Patriots of America, of which Mrs. Oliver Harriman was chairman; later, however, this arrangement was reduced to 60 per cent. The firm, in soliciting advertising, repeatedly signed the name of Mrs. Oliver Harriman to requests for money against her express wishes and her demands to the contrary. When summoned to the district attorney's office for examination, they were accompanied by their counsel, Keevie Frankel, of 51 Chambers Street. During the course of their examination their memories became very faulty. They could not recall the names of the war charities they had worked for, nor could they give the percentages they had charged. They stated they could not make satisfactory answers to the questions asked them without first refreshing their recollection by referring to their books and records. Upon their promise to produce their books the next day the examination was adjourned. The next day they returned to the district attorney's office without the books and records, and told the pitiful story that the night before some one had broken into their office and had taken every record, book, or paper, and had destroyed them. Even their canceled check vouchers had been removed and destroyed. Curry was indicted on a charge of forging Mrs. Harriman's name to a request for funds. Saunders turned State's evidence against Curry and revealed the unscrupulous methods of the firm. He stated that in numerous instances checks, aggregating thousands of dollars, were collected, cashed, and the proceeds misappropriated, without a cent going to the charity for which it was intended. The firm was forced out of business.

The Wheaton Service Corporation, of which Edward F. Wheaton was president, and E. J. Hutson, treasurer, was organized for the specific purpose of exploiting war-relief work. They had contracts with the Ninth Regiment, the Twelfth Regiment, and the Thirteenth Coast Artillery for the solicitation of advertisements and donations. Edward F. Wheaton, the president, is an ex-convict, having served a term in the workhouse at Columbus, Ohio, some six years ago for larceny; he was formerly associated in business with Clarence W. Robnet, who was sentenced to the penitentiary by an Iowa court. The contracts were usually in a 30–70 per cent basis; that is, 70 per cent went to the Wheaton Service Corporation and 30 per cent to the charity for which the money was collected. After a visit to the district attorney's office, the corporation promptly retired from business. Wheaton left the city, and Hutson agreed to refund $1,500 to the war charity from which it was taken.

Samuel R. Wiley was an advertising solicitor associated with the Minute Men of America; he solicited advertisements for the program of the benefit and rally of that organization which was held at the Manhattan Opera House in November, 1917. Wiley was said to have received a flat salary of $30 a week and his solicitors were allowed 25 per cent commission on the amounts taken in. Wiley's picture is in the rogue's gallery, where he is listed as "a bogus collector"; he pleaded guilty in 1907 to the charge of fraudulently soliciting for charitable purposes. He also has retired as a charity worker.

MRS. WILLIAM CUMMING STORY AND THE NATIONAL EMERGENCY RELIEF SOCIETY.

The National Emergency Relief Society was organized in September, 1917, for the purpose of giving immediate relief and aid to enlisted men. The society has a membership of 125, and included on its roster are the names of many ladies of excellent social standing and reputation. Mrs. William Cumming Story, a well-known club woman, was president of this organization and the dominant figure in it.

The society raised approximately $30,000. The money was raised principally by an advertising solicitor named William Garland Brown on a 50 per cent–50 per cent contract; that is, Brown received 50 per cent on all moneys he solicited on behalf of the society. Solicitation was made on the representation that the money was to be used to purchase comfort kits for soldiers. The subscription blanks requested that checks be made to the order of the treasurer, but the return envelopes were so addressed that they were sent to Mrs. William Cumming Story, who, in turn, it is presumed, handed the checks over to the treasurer. Whether all the checks so received reached their destination can not be determined, for there is no way of checking them up.

It developed from the examination of Mr. Brown that 20 per cent of the net profits under his contract went to Sterling Story, the son of Mrs. William Cumming Story. Brown's net profit up to the date of his examination (Mar. 23, 1918) on the amount collected was, approximately, $3,500, and up to that time he had paid Sterling Story $715.15. It appeared from Brown's examination that Sterling Story had introduced Brown to his mother, and that after the contract had been put through by Mrs. Story with the National Emergency Relief Society Sterling Story came to Brown and demanded his share. Brown's statement of what Sterling said to him is as follows:

"He said he would like to get something out of it." * * * When I got down to the actual profit to me on the whole six months' contract, I find that I paid him 20 per cent for the work he did. I paid him the equivalent of 20 per cent on the whole net profit."

Brown, in an effort to justify his relations with Sterling Story, added that Story was paid this money because he had handed to Brown's stenographers names to whom literature was to be addressed. He stated, however, that under no circumstances would he have engaged Sterling Story on a salary basis, adding that "on a salary proposition I wouldn't give him 20 cents a week—he was too unreliable."

In further explaining his relations with Sterling Story, Brown stated that he had met him while he was working with the American Defense Society two years before, and that Sterling Story was on the pay roll of that society; and that when Brown later went with the Junior Naval Reserve he found Sterling Story was also engaged by that society on a salary.

Mrs. Story has endeavored to justify before the society the moneys paid to her son on the theory that he had done other work for Mr. Brown. On this point Mr. Brown's statement is as follows:

"Q. Did Sterling Story ever work for you while you were connected with the American Defense Society or the Junior Naval Reserve?—A. No, sir.

"Q. He was not on your pay roll at any time?—A. No, sir.

"Q. Did you ever pay Sterling Story anything except the moneys you have specified here?—A. No, sir.

"Q. You never paid him for any work on the American Defense Society?—A. No; that was two years before.

"Q. Never anything on the Junior Naval Reserve or any other organization?—A. No, sir; I don't recall paying him a cent.

"Q. The money you paid him was the correct percentage on the work done for the National Emergency Relief Society?—A. Yes."

Upon the direction of the district attorney's office, on March 18, 1918, the "50–50" contract with Mr. Brown was canceled.

It may not be amiss to state that in December, 1917, Mrs. Story was requested to call at the office of the district attorney where she was informed that the district attorney did not look with favor upon "50–50" contracts and considered that contracts of that character were unconscionable and a fraud upon the public. At that time Mr. Brown had a contract with the society on a 40–60 per cent basis; that is, 40 per cent of the proceeds went to Brown and 60 per cent to the society, and notwithstanding the fact that both Mr. Brown and Mrs. Story had been warned in the manner indicated, a new contract on a "50–50" basis was thereafter entered into between Brown and the society under negotiations conducted by Mrs. Story.

It also appeared in the early history of the society that Mrs. Story had made an attempt to induce the society to publish a book written by Brown entitled "The Home Economic Book." The attempt, however, was unsuccessful. It would have required upward of $5,000 to $10,000 to properly finance the publication and advertise the sale of the book, and it was only by the watchfulness of some of the members that the proposition was thwarted. It did not appear, however, that Mrs. Story had any financial interest in the proposition.

It is remarkable to note that although a treasurer had been duly elected by the society and had had the custody of upward of $14,000, Mrs. Story saw fit to collect from Hero Land $325 in March, 1918, which check she did not turn over to the treasurer until advised to do so by her counsel some months later after the district attorney had indicated that the retention of the check might constitute larceny.

The investigation into the affairs of his society revealed another interesting item of information, and that is Sterling Story's activities in regard to the printing bills. The society contracted printing bills with one Robert Myer to the amount of $860.65, on which a commission of 10 per cent was given to a Mr. Gunthier, a solicitor who was associated with Sterling Story in the Naval and Merchant Marine Corps of the United States of America. Mr. Myer's books reveal the fact that the entries for the different printing orders were sometimes made in the name of Sterling Story and sometimes in the name of the National Emergency Relief Society. Whether any member of the Story family shared in the commissions on printing was not disclosed by the investigation.

A second son, Allen Story, received a commission of $90 for the rental of No. 238 Madison Avenue as a headquarters for the society. The negotiations for the leases were conducted by Mrs. Story.

Mrs. Story has been interested for some time in patriotic and war-relief societies. She was director general of the Daughters of the American Revolution for two terms and is a member of the Colonial Dames. Some time ago she became a member of the American Defense Society, and shortly thereafter became chairman of the woman's division of that society. Her son, Sterling Story, was put on the pay roll of the American Defense Society at a handsome salary. Mrs. Story was later dropped from the society.

Mrs. Story was also a member of the Naval and Merchant Marine Corps of the United States Army, and her name appears on the letterhead of that organization as national vice president; her son, Sterling Story, appears as commander, and Capt. Lewis Till as commandant; Sterling Story also succeeded in getting his name on the pay roll of the Marine Corps. Sterling Story and Capt. Till had complete charge of the affairs of the Naval and Merchant Marine Corps of the United States Army until it became involved in financial difficulties. Capt. Till stated that he had a post-office box at the Seventy-first Regiment Armory, and that all letters and donations were sent there, and that no one had a key to his letter box there excepting himself and Sterling Story. There was an "irregularity" of some $3,700 in the corps, which Capt. Till has been allowed to account for at his leisure, and the Naval and Marine Corps of the United States Army passed out of existence; its work was taken up by the American Junior Naval Reserve. While the Naval and Merchant Marine Corps of the United States Army was in progress Mrs. Story unsuccessfully attempted to amalgamate it with the National Emergency Relief Society.

Mrs. Story and her two sons were indicted for accepting illegal commissions; additional indictments were also filed against Mrs. Story charging her with larceny. On September 2, 1918, Mr. Brown, who was the principal witness against the Storys, died, and with his death the indictments must fall.

Baroness H———.

The Baroness H——— is the daughter of a well-known American actor and the wife of a French artist. They had a small summer place in France which was in the war zone and in the path of the German advance on Paris. The place was captured by the Germans, but was later recaptured by the French. Her war experiences were put into book form, the books being based on her alleged experiences with the Germans and the capture of her home. She has lectured extensively in this country in behalf of war-relief work, her lectures containing the same alleged experiences related in her books. Her method of raising funds is to lecture before clubs, societies, and at public meetings, and immediately following the lectures an appeal for money is made. The work is conducted under the auspices of a fund for the ostensible purpose of furnishing a hospital said to be located in her home in France. At the lectures she also sells lithographs of her husband's paintings for $5 apiece. It is said that her book contains many fictions and exaggerations, and that the ancestral chateau which is so elaborately described in her writings was a small place bought on mortgage shortly before the war in which they invested $700. The retinue of servants, automobiles, and carriages, we are informed, consisted of one horse, a cart, and a driving carriage, and the only servants were a peasant and his wife, who worked in and about the chateau. Her income from charity work, from royalty on her books, from the sale of lithographs of her husband's paintings, and fees for lectures amount to $15,000 annually. It is nevertheless true that she raised some $30,000 or $40,000 for the hospital fund. The accounts of this fund are regularly and well audited, and the moneys furnished forwarded to France. The fact remains, however, that she is making a handsome yearly profit out of her war-relief work and her war experience.

Countess T———.

Countess T——— came to this country in October, 1915, and since that time has been engaged in war-relief work and in raising funds for a European reconstruction committee. A trial balance of the committee submitted on October 8, 1918, showed that the committee had raised $31,697.24.

Mrs. T——— is the daughter of an architect and mining engineer and was born in Canada, but came to New York City at an early age. At present she is living with her sister in a small New Jersey town. In 1901 and 1902 she sang in the choir of a church in New York City. * * * At that time she was an amateur actress and appeared in Shakespearean rôles. She went abroad in 1904 or 1905 to complete her musical education in Berlin, and was singing professionally in that city and other places in Germany in 1910. She claims to have married in 1907 a professor in one of the leading universities in Europe. She has three children, whom she brought with her from her adopted country in 1915. She has written a book * * * in which she describes her alleged experiences with the Germans. The following is a brief review of her published story:

The book purports to relate the experiences of an American woman during the German invasion of Poland and is advertised as an authentic account of experiences that actually happened. She tells her experiences since the outbreak of the war in 1914, when the Germans invaded Poland and captured her home, and she discusses her escape from Poland into Berlin, and from Berlin to America, through Holland, early in 1915. The book is written in true dramatic form with all the elements present that appeal to the sympathies. She lays considerable stress on the fact that she was alone with her three children, who were sick with typhus fever, and in true melodramatic form states that her husband, who just left to go on a Government mission a day before, was always absent when each misfortune befell her. She relates that one of her children was taken ill with typhus fever, and she was unable to leave the place until after it was captured by the Germans. Then briefly follows her experience with the Germans who were quartered within her house and a description in detail of how she finally obtained leave to go to Berlin, where she met the American ambassador, James W. Gerard, and through his good offices was able to get a passport to New York. Her application for a passport, however, was delayed until some one could be found to identify her. With an art that was worthy of the genius of George M. Cohan, at the proper time a man was found who heard her sing the Star Spangled Banner in Berlin some six years prior, and upon his identification the passport was issued. In order to fully arouse sympathy and to show that she was hounded even in America, she states that she was met at the pier in New York by three German women of wealth, who offered her money and help, all of which she spurned; and from the pier, as the story runs in the book, she went to the Martha Washington Hotel, where she reduced her mournful tale to writing.

She refers often in her book to the various homes, to her great retinue of servants, to her art treasures, and to her libraries and paintings; and she frequently related that while she was detained by the Germans she fed prisoners of war with a lavish hand; indeed, it is remarkable the number of clothes that her husband had; she kept giving them to soldiers, to prisoners of war, and to friends of Poland in a way that was astounding. She describes in an amazing manner the condition of her house after the Prussian soldiers left and tells with descriptive effect how her libraries, tapestries, bookcases, and priceless treasures had been cut, demolished, and befouled by the retreating Hun.

However, during all these horrible experiences she never saw her husband and only heard from him through messenger or by telegraph; always laying emphasis on the fact that when the horrible experiences occurred she was alone with her children. She describes in detail the condition of the refugees, telling how the women were maltreated and rushed to the railroad station, some of them giving birth to children in the station and on the trains; she tells how pitiful the prisoners of war were—the Poles who, starved by the Germans, dug out of dung heaps and in hospital yards crusts of bread and ate them.

While she does not mention Von Hindenburg by name, yet at page 119 she states that "the next Friday the great man who was quartered with us," referring to Von Hindenburg; and then she describes him as a glutton and a drunkard. He drank copiously; in fact, "I have never seen such a capacity for 'schnaps,' ate tremendously, and the only topic of conversation was what he had done or was about to do." She also states that he was quartered in the house for some time, and at page 123 she refers to the fact that the Crown Prince, although she does not mention him by name, visited Von Hindenburg and stayed at her house. Her statement reads, "On the last day when the great man was with us, another great personage was also there, quite a fat, beery, scion of royalty, neither clever nor interesting."

And while she does not mention in her book the fact that she had been insulted by German officers, yet she tells how her servant was taken by the Germans and delivered to the soldiers; and when she asked the officer to return the girl he said, "I am very sorry, but you are not allowed to take her; she belongs to the soldiers," intimating that the girl had been outraged by the soldiers, who had given her a horrible disease.

Mrs. ———'s activities have been carefully investigated, and the conclusion seems to be inevitable that statements in the book are greatly exaggerated.

She was the wife of a railroad engineer at ———, with a very small income and no social standing. Since she came to this country it is said that she has been associated with the K. O. N., the Polish National Defense Committee, the leader of which movement is one X——— * * *. It is said he was associated with Soukhomlinoff, the infamous Russian minister of war, who was tried by the Kerensky government and sentenced to life imprisonment for treason. X——— was looked upon as decidedly pro-German; he is now in this country, and it is stated that he is against anyone of prominence who is interested in the welfare of Poland, and he is particularly opposed, and has been for some time, to Paderewski and the patriotic interests he represents.

It seems to be a well-established fact that neither Von Hindenburg nor the Crown Prince was in the neighborhood of the town where "The Countess" says Hindenburg was stationed at her house, and it is also doubted whether she was ever taken prisoner. Those familiar with conditions in Poland declare that the statements contained in her book are unreliable.

A prominent English official writes concerning her property in Poland:

"The nature of his employment [the husband of Mrs. T———] would seem to indicate that he had no fortune of his own, and the lady's declaration in the course of a New York interview to the effect that she paid the greater part of the contribution of 200,000 rubles levied by the Germans upon the Polish-Russian town of ———, where her husband was employed as a professor, should be received with a considerable amount of caution."

One thing seems to be certain, and that is that the T——— family is not a family of noble blood; her husband was not a count, and the Marquisate of Y——— is unknown. Neither of these titles appear in the pages of any of the official and standard lists dealing with the Russian, the Polish, or the German aristocracy. When she first arrived in this country it is stated that she assumed the title of marchioness. However, when her attention was called to the fact that the title of marchioness was essentially French or English, she discarded it and called herself a princess for a short time. That title became too conspicuous, and she condescended to take the title of "countess," which she is now using, and permits herself to be so advertised in the public press. Students of conditions in Poland say that there are very few counts in Poland; Poland was the first Republic, and that anyone who distinguished himself on the battle field had the right to put "Icz" or "Ski" after his name, showing that he had rendered distinguished services to his country. It seems to be established beyond doubt that while in Poland "The Countess" lived very modestly in a small house in a summer resort near ———, and because of lack of money was not able to rent an apartment for the winter in that city itself.

It is remarkable that once having been captured by the Germans, she was permitted to be released and allowed to proceed to America unhindered. She avers that her husband up to the time of the armistice was held as a prisoner of war by the Germans.

It has been repeatedly hinted that the family in Poland were pro-German and were so listed by the patriotic Poles in Russia.

The fact seems to point to the inference that since she came to this country "The Countess" has greatly improved her financial and social condition, and that her war-relief work has contributed handsomely to her purse. She admitted in her examination in the district attorney's office that "The first year I had a very hard time, because the Germans persecuted me continually, and after that I wrote my book, and then it got better * * *. Then, finally, some of my friends organized the 'reconstruction committee.'"

She stated that she received $5,000 a year as a royalty on her book; that she also received $250 a month from the reconstruction committee; and that she sometimes received $200 per lecture for her lecture work.

In her lectures it is said that she capitalizes the claim that she was made a prisoner of war by Von Hindenburg; that her chateau was occupied by him, and that at times she had to wait upon him. As late as October 15, 1918, her press agent sent out a notice, which read in part as follows:

"The Countess ———, whose chateau was captured and occupied by Gen. Von Hindenburg as he entered Russia, and who was forced to wait upon him, will speak before members and friends of the Institutional Synagogue this Sunday morning at the Mount Morris Theater."

This, we are informed by intelligent Poles of this country, is typical of the press notices sent out on her behalf and with her sanction.

THE DRAKE SECTION SANITAIRE.

A remarkable incident of the charity investigation was the exposure of the Drake Section Sanitaire, organized and conducted under the auspices of Miss Ethel Langdon Drake; associated with her was Mrs. Mary E. Symons. Miss Drake attempted to recruit young women drivers for a thousand ambulances, which, it is alleged, she intended to equip and send to France. An appeal was made to the public for funds on behalf of the Hospital Symons-Drake, France, as well as for the Drake ambulance. The appeal for the hospital was made in behalf of special funds—the barraque fund, the bed fund, the refugee fund, and the surgical-instrument fund—all being grouped under the general head of the Hospital Symons-Drake, France. A hospital was to be established in France when contributions of the charitably inclined permitted it. Miss Drake's name appeared as secretary and treasurer of the Hospital Symons-Drake, France, and a prominent banking house in New York City was named as the depositary of the fund.

In the ambulance fund Miss Drake was able to gather together 20 or 30 women of excellent social standing, who were drilling and recruiting for the ambulance corps. Nine of the recruits resided in New York City; others came from the West and Southwest, and one young lady came from San Antonio, Tex. They were obliged to pay Miss Drake the sum of $100 a month for the privilege of belonging to the corps, and in return were to receive such training as she saw fit to give. For this purpose a training camp was established at the Oaks, Bayside, Long Island, N. Y., where the young ladies went into the active training. They arose at 6 o'clock every morning and worked and drilled until 9 o'clock at night. They slept in tents on the drill ground and dined in the mansion house on the premises, which they also used as a dressing room, and paraded a distance of several hundred feet from the mansion to their tents nightly in their pajamas.

It was revealed that Miss Drake had written to officers of the French Army letters in which she offered to donate to them 23 motor ambulances, a touring car, and a touring van. She received in return from each of the officers a letter thanking her for her donation of the 25 motor cars. These letters were published in a circular, without the explanation that the letters only accepted the offer made, and that the cars were not actually delivered; the public were, therefore, led to believe that the cars were actually donated and delivered, and that the published letters from the officers were in grateful acknowledgment and appreciation of her gift. In her examination Miss Drake admitted that the circular was misleading and that the statement quoted below should read that the ambulances were intended to be given.

"The 25 ambulances which Miss Drake has already given provide partial relief to one army, but the need is manifold, and Miss Drake is hoping to be able to take back with her from 500 to 1,000 ambulances. * * * As you read the expression of gratitude for the 25 ambulances already accepted, contained in the early letters and as the spirit of appreciation sent forth in the letter of May 24, then ask yourself what measure of thanks will be yours when Miss Drake is able to offer the magnificent donation of 500 or 1,000 ambulances above referred to."

Arrangements had been made with Mrs. William A. Gavin, the well-known golf player, to give golf tournaments throughout the country, the proceeds of which were to go to the Drake Section Sanitaire. Upward of $30,000 was raised in this manner by Mrs. Gavin, but had not been delivered to the Drake Section Sanitaire when the district attorney's attention was first attracted to the fund.

Miss Drake, who is 43 years of age, dressed in the uniform of a nurse, which bore a striking resemblance to the dress of a sister of a religious order.

Miss Drake and Mrs. Symons had a suite of rooms at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, in New York City, which were used as headquarters. Miss Drake has had an interesting career; her secretary stated that "she started in the charity game with nothing but a comb and a brush." It is said that Miss Drake was born in a small town in Massachusetts. She was for some time a dressmaker in Chicago, a venture which resulted in failure; she then went to Boston and became a Christian Science healer. From Boston she went to France, and then to England. In London, at a card party, she met Mrs. Mary E. Symons, the wife of a major in the British Army, who also has a son in the British Army.

Mrs. Symons wears two decorations for war-relief work. One is the Croix de Guerre and the other is the gold medal of the La Ministre des Affaires Etranger, which she received for valor in ambulance work under fire. It is stated that these medals were often worn by Miss Drake as her own, and that she had her picture taken in her nurse's uniform wearing the decorations. Mrs. Symons had a small monthly allowance, and came under the influence of Miss Drake, who induced her to leave England and come to the United States for the purpose of recruiting the Drake ambulance corps. Because of the relations existing between the two women, Mrs. Symons admitted that her husband had forced her from his house.

When Miss Drake was confronted with the facts in the case she consented to discontinue her war-relief work in this country. Thereupon the ambulance corps was disbanded, the recruits returned to their homes, and the moneys which had been collected were directed to be turned over to M. Jusserand, the French ambassador, or returned to the donors. The young ladies who were recruits in the ambulance corps were mulcted of the money that they had paid for uniforms and for transportation, and had nothing from the enterprise but experience.

COUNTESS CHIQUITA (CHIC) MAZZUCHI.

The Countess Mazzuchi (known as the Angel of the Marne) claims that she was born at Singapore, China, 30 years ago, and that she is the daughter of a Spanish ambassador and an English woman. She also states that she is a niece of Cardinal Vaughan, and that her first husband was Lord Seymour, a nephew of Admiral Seymour.

She first attracted attention as a speaker at Keith's Theater for the Red Cross drive and other war-relief work. It subsequently developed that she was receiving $200 a week from the Keith Circuit for her appearances. Accounts of her alleged experiences in the war zone had been published in the New York press from time to time, which accounts she admits were grossly exaggerated.

She avers that she has done considerable war relief and hospital work in the war zone, and now suffers from "trench feet," and that while driving an ambulance she was wounded in the hip by the Germans. The following quotation is from her statement given in the district attorney's office on June 22, 1918: "I have a dirty German bullet in my left hip. Just feel it. Lots of people have felt!"

For a time she occupied an apartment at 28 West Fifty-seventh Street, which was used as an assembly room for soldiers and officers.

Her favorite method of collecting was to assemble a number of officers or enlisted men and tour the hotels at Long Beach and other resorts. The young men would sing camp songs and the "Countess" would deliver a thrilling speech and then take up a collection. How much money was collected in this way and what became of it is impossible to state.

Our investigations show that the "Countess" was a well-known figure on the Great White Way in 1901, when, under the name of "Clarita Vidal," she was a chorus girl in "Floradora," "The Silver Slipper,"

"Cynthia," "The School Girl," and other productions. She was a member of the Stanford White coterie, and her name appears in the press of that year in several startling episodes. Two or three years ago she was divorced by her second husband, and the custody of her child was taken away from her on the ground that she was an unfit person to have charge of it. The child is now in a convent in Italy.

Our reports would indicate that for a year previous to her appearance in New York, in July last, she was living in a villa in San Remo, while, according to her stories, she was performing wonderful feats of valor in hospitals at the front.

Upon information adduced in the investigation of her activities, the district attorney requested her to discontinue her war-relief work.

THEATERS AND MUSIC.

The sale of songs on the streets, in public places, conveyances, and places of amusement has been an annoying source of fraud in the charity field. A number of musicians and song writers, inspired by the activities of the war, composed songs of mediocre quality, which they farmed out to publishers or to agencies for publication. Singers were engaged to go into public restaurants and public gatherings to sing the songs to the accompaniment of music, while an associate passed among the crowd and sold copies at a small price. In many instances, especially in the better-class cafés, large sums of money were dropped into the basket for a song and no change received. It is said that amounts ranging from $1 to $10 were dropped in the basket and the holder of the basket told to donate the entire proceeds to charity. In these cases the fixed prices for the songs were usually turned into the fund and the balance was kept by the worker. Occasionally the entire proceeds were kept. It was a favorite feature to have a man in a soldier's or sailor's uniform sing the song.

In Januafy, 1918, George Heather, his mother, Mrs. Heather, and an associate, Mrs. Blanche Moore, were arrested in the Black Cat Restaurant, at 557 West Broadway. Heather, dressed in sailor's uniform, sang a song entitled "Do Your Bit; Buy a Bit for Our Boys in France." The song was written by George F. Bickford, of Brooklyn, and its cover carried the reputed indorsement of Cardinal Gibbons, Theodore Roosevelt, and other persons of prominence. While selling the song Heather would announce that the proceeds were for "Our boys in France tobacco fund." The trio was turned over to the United States authorities, and Heather was subsequently indicted for illegally wearing a sailor's uniform.

Another form of fraud was that of padding the expense accounts of entertainments and benefits, and the filing of forged vouchers purporting to represent receipts from actors and actresses for money paid for services given at benefits, when the services were, in fact, voluntary. It is a well-known fact that actors and actresses gave their services and time generously and without charge to all war-relief work; our information, however, is that in many instances expense accounts were swollen by items purporting to represent sums of money paid to performers for their services. The money so entered was deducted by the promoters from the proceeds of the entertainment.

A new species of fraud is found in the practice of ticket speculators selling cards of admission to free entertainments. In November, 1917, a Red Cross entertainment was given at the Hippodrome at which there was no admission fee, entrance being by cards of admission issued to Red Cross workers. Some of these tickets fell into the hands of ticket speculators and seats were sold at from $3 to $10. On Liberty Day, October 12, 1918, a free entertainment and reception, at which President Wilson attended, was given at the Metropolitan Opera House; admission cards were issued to the liberty-loan workers, and many cards fell into the hands of ticket speculators, who sold them for prices that ran as high as $25 per seat.

The sale of complimentary tickets to theatrical benefits given by war-relief committees is a despicable form of fraud that was unearthed in the investigation. It appeared that in a number of cases where performances were given for war-relief work under the direction of theatrical agents, complimentary tickets punched "Complimentary" were directed to be issued to the press and to dramatic critics; in many instances, however, all tickets so punched and set aside for a special purpose were not delivered as directed, but were sold by the agencies and the money kept.

A source of complaint lodged in this office during the investigation was the overcharging for admission by ticket speculators to war-relief benefits and entertainments. During the benefit held for the Red Cross in May, 1917, at the Century Theater, tickets that ordinarily sold for $5 apiece were sold by speculators for $20; and at the benefit for the Sixty-ninth Regiment, held at the Hippodrome in September, 1918, tickets that ordinarily sold for $2.50 brought as high as $10 when sold by speculators. "Yip, Yip, Yaphank" was an entertainment given by the boys from Yaphank. Some of the tickets fell into the hands of speculators and the prices were, in many instances, doubled and tripled.

Even for the ordinary shows on holidays and Saturday nights, outrageous prices were charged to the men in the service. In one case brought to the attention of this office, on a Saturday night at the Hippodrome, a speculator sold a sailor two 50-cent tickets for $2.25 each, and there were many other instances of serious overcharges. The matter of ticket speculators, however, has been remedied by a city ordinance prepared in this office which has recently become a law.

IV. FOOLISH CHARITIES.

The investigation revealed many ill-conceived or absurd war-relief charities; ofttimes these were well intended, and the promoters of the enterprise sincere, earnest, and honest. Under this heading we may mention the following typical examples:

(1) The American League for World Peace by Allied Victory, conceived and launched by Max Baum, of No. 553 West One hundred and eighty-seventh Street. A circular issued by Baum read:

"I have a project which will require from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000 to complete, and it is desirable that contributions of $500 and upward be received from each of many thousands of contributions. It is not my intention to handle any of the funds nor do I want any compensation or reward, except proper credit for my proposition."

In the New York Herald, of May 21, 1918, he inserted the following advertisement:

"American world patriots, Attention: 'Those only desiring allied victorious peace' do not neglect to communicate immediately for cooperation with Max C. Baum, No. 553 West One hundred and eighty-seventh Street."

When called before the grand jury he stated that his scheme was to build secretly 100,000 aeroplanes for immediate dispatch to Europe. He was to take them to Washington and turn them over to the Government. Notwithstanding the wildness of his scheme, he was able to attract the attention of men of wealth and standing in this country.

(2) The American Federation of Flying Yacht Clubs was a scheme inaugurated by Lieut. T. C. Mars. Life membership in the club was fixed at $1,000 each. H. W. Merwin, a professional solicitor, of 31 Nassau Street, was engaged to solicit membership on a "50-50" basis; $16,000 or $18,000 was raised in this way. Mars's scheme was to inaugurate clubs all over the country for the encouragement of flying as a sport and as a business enterprise. As far as could be ascertained, the only persons receiving any benefit from the enterprise was Mars and the solicitors. At the request of the district attorney the scheme was abandoned.

(3) The Godfathers' League of Our Allies was a scheme devised by George W. Gabriel, who signed himself as secretary. The object was to raise money for comforts and smokes for the boys "over there." The circular sent forth stated:

"You can adopt a soldier for the duration of the war by putting aside a stipend every month for him or send it to him as many times as you like; kindly designate, if any, which particular soldiers you care to help."

Only a small amount of money, however, was raised by Gabriel before he was requested to call at this office.

(4) The National Prayer for All Mothers of the Defenders of Democracy: It is difficult to ascertain the purpose of this organization. Its activities in New York were conducted by Brown-Lansdowne from offices in the Vanderbilt Avenue Building, 51 East Forty-second Street; appeals were made to the public for money, and our information is that the responses were so few that the society soon passed out of existence.

V. MISCELLANEOUS FRAUDS.

Under this heading are included minor methods and devices which proved to be a fertile field for fraud and graft.

(1) Block parties: Block parties became a popular institution in New York City during the past summer, and there is scarcely a block in the city in which a "party" has not been held and a service flag raised in honor of those who were called to the colors. Money to meet the expenses was raised by popular subscription; this money was expended for flags, decorations, music, fireworks, and kindred charges.

The amount raised varied with the enthusiasm and energy of the collectors; in some blocks as high as $1,500 has been raised, while in some sections of the city no more than $75 was secured. Complaints have been made that the money raised for these objects occasionally has been misappropriated. From investigations made into the conduct of many parties it is evident that respectable sums of money have been stolen; in many cases restitution of the money was forced, and in some cases the collectors disappeared from the city.

(2) Matrimonial agencies: With our advent into the war a number of enterprising men, usually of foreign birth, devised the scheme of instituting matrimonial agencies for the benefit and convenience of the men in the service. The ostensible object was to get dutiful wives for soldiers or prospective soldiers. In some instances the scheme was intended to help the soldier to evade the draft; in other instances, the bureau was conducted in good faith. However, in a number of the cases investigated, the bureaus were conducted for the sole purpose of defrauding the soldier. In one case brought to our attention by the Military Intelligence Bureau the matrimonial agency was operated by a Hungarian who was an ex-convict. His proposition was to put soldiers in communication with prospective brides for sums ranging from $5 to $25. Upon payment of the sum demanded, the names of four or five women were furnished to the soldier, who was to get in communication with them by letter. It developed that the director of the agency had in his employ some 8 or 10 servant girls, some of whom were married, some were widows, and others of questionable character; these were used as dupes for the soldiers. Upon payment of the money, the names, addresses, and photographs of the girl dupes were forwarded to the soldier, and after a little correspondence between the girl and the soldier (which was always conducted by the director of the agency himself and not by the girl), the correspondence ceased, and the soldier was out his money and also his bride. Because of the difficulty in getting the soldiers, who were serving in France, to appear as witnesses, no prosecution was attempted; however, the agency was closed.

(3) The Alien Women's and Children's Relief was conducted by Robert C. Veller and Rudolph C. Toth, two alien enemies. Their ostensible purpose was to raise money for the care of the children and families of interned alien enemies. Large sums of money were raised in this way, but very little of it was used to aid dependent families of those interned. Complaint against Veller and Toth is now pending in the district attorney's office and will be presented to the grand jury at an early date.

(4) The Children's Free Lunch League, at No. 4 East Thirty-ninth Street, was conducted by Bertha Herman and her husband. The scheme was to raise money for free lunches for children of soldiers in the American Army. During the time the league was in progress $2,100 was raised, of which sum $300 was actually expended for lunches; the balance of $1,800 went for overhead expenses and salaries. The enterprise was forced to discontinue.

(5) The Christian Nonsectarian Rescue Church of the Living God had headquarters at 336 West Forty-first Street. It is a mission conducted by colored people for the rescue of fallen men and women. It turned its activities to collecting funds for colored soldiers and their dependents. It is said that in the headquarters orgies were often indulged in at night under the guise of religious ceremonies. No record was kept of the moneys collected or disbursed, and they were unable to show that a single dollar of the money contributed had been expended for the families of the dependent colored soldiers in the service. Their activities in war-relief work were discontinued.

(6) Mrs. Smith, who conducts a boarding house in Brooklyn, conceived the idea of gathering canes and crutches for the wounded soldiers and sailors in the hospitals in Brooklyn. She advertised for canes and crutches in the Brooklyn and in the New York papers. Soon she had a large collection from a generous public. Some of the canes were very valuable, having silver and gold mountings, and some were made of rare wood. Instead of distributing the canes to the hospitals, she kept them in her home, placing them on exhibition in the hall racks, in the parlor, and upstairs. At the time the matter was called to the attention of this office upward of 300 canes and crutches were in her collection. She agreed to distribute the canes and cease from collecting others.

(7) Street collecting: The street collector is both a nuisance and a menace. There is no form of relief work that affords so many opportunities for petty fraud. His manner is sometimes obsequious, sometimes imperious, and often even threatening.

Every day the citizen is confronted on the street with urgent pleas to relieve some oppressing need of war sufferers. The blind soldier seems now to be the favorite subject of appeal on the street corner. There is nothing in the history of war that appeals so effectively to human nature as a soldier who has been blinded in the cause of his country. Sometimes the request for money rolls glibly from the tongue of a fair solicitor and gallant man is unable to resist the call. The appeal of childhood is also availed of to open the recalcitrant pocketbook of the passer-by, thus subjecting the children employed to the temptations of petty graft in the soliciting of funds and the sale of minor articles on the streets and in public conveyances. The price was often overpaid by generous purchasers in the expectation that the full sum might find its way to the charitable object, subjecting the child to the temptation, frequently yielded to, of returning only the price set and appropriating the change.

VI. Patriotic Societies.

A related activity which came within the scope of the investigation was that of the so-called patriotic societies which sprang up throughout the country and met with varying degrees of success. While these institutions were not directly engaged in war relief work, the large sums collected by popular subscriptions to their treasuries suggested the need, as they came within the purview of the investigation, of scrutinizing their activities and bringing to light their methods and purposes.

The growing spirit of patriotism before America entered the war was played upon by the promoters of those institutions who rang the changes with flamboyant expressions of patriotic sentiments and sonorous title. The public purse was liberally tapped with apparently the same degree of sincerity and scrupulousness as that exhibited in war relief endeavors. Here, too, the same varieties of human weaknesses were disclosed. Many instances were discovered where "soi de sant" patriotic societies sprang up, mulcted the trusting and generous, and disbanded or disappeared.

Early in the investigation the attention of the district attorney's office was called to the so-called League for Loyal Americans (Inc.). The league was founded May 29, 1917, by Milo T. Bogart, as executive director, and established headquarters at No. 200 Broadway, New York City. The enrollment card upon which subscriptions were received bore in colors on its face the shield of the United States and the following statement: "I hereby declare myself in full sympathy with every movement that aims to unite American citizens in the cause for which the league stands—'America efficient, prepared, and protected.'"

Bogart, when examined, promptly confessed that he was an ex-convict, had served three years in the penitentiary at Chester, Ill., and admitted having collected $600 or $800 up to the time his corporation was investigated. He consented to discontinue his propaganda and retire from the field of patriotic and war-relief work. Such a man was able to include among his charter members such distinguished citizens as Hon. Elihu Root, Robert Bacon, Hon. Reed Smoot, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Hon. James W. Gerard, and Judge Norman S. Dike. His avowed object was to raise funds for the purpose of drilling American citizens and the organization of a well-prepared army for national defense.

The Loyal Publicity League of America was the title under which Chester A. Applegate and W. H. Thompson conducted an ostensibly patriotic society at 1482 Broadway, New York City. The vehicle here used to extract money for personal gain by patriotic appeal was the issuance to citizens of foreign birth of a formidable questionnaire upon which, if the answers under oath were satisfactory, a diploma or certificate of loyalty was issued for a specified fee. This diploma or certificate was represented as an open sesame to the select circle of patriotic Americans. This form of fraud was promptly suppressed.

A flagrant example of the uncontrolled institution of these societies is found in the case of the Boy Scouts of America and the United States Boy Scouts, two rival organizations in the Boy Scout movement in the United States. The Boy Scouts of America, from all appearances, is an organization that has been conducted upon a high moral plane, well administered, and its funds faithfully applied for the benefit of the youth of America, and has flourished for some years. The United States Boy Scouts, however, was an organization formed in competition with the Boy Scouts of America which capitalized the good name of its rival and secured money contributions through the misapprehension on the part of the donors that the moneys were to be applied for the support of the Boy Scouts of America, a confusion which the similarity of the names employed made possible.

Contributions were obtained by the United States Boy Scouts upon appeals containing statements admittedly false concerning the number of their members and the disposition of their funds, and, so far as has been revealed, the only beneficiary of the donations or activities of the organization is one Ammerman, treasurer, who conducts a jewelry business at Nos. 5 and 7 Dey Street, where he also maintains the national headquarters for the United States Boy Scouts. "Majors," "colonels," and other "officers" are appointed with reckless abandon by Ammerman wherever contributions may be stimulated thereby, and one of these officers, Col. J. E. Smith, an ex-convict, who served a term for bigamy in Indiana, was sent to places of amusement making appeals for funds and taking up collections. Neither the amount of money collected by the United States Boy Scouts nor the number of its members or the disposition of its funds has been ascertained; neither has it been revealed or discovered that any part of the funds collected have been expended for the benefit of the boys in whose behalf the donations were made.

The National Women's Army, conducted by Col. Netta I. Boardman, proposed the enrollment of women for military training for self-defense as a device for securing a membership fee. Funds were also raised by public entertainments and private appeals. No accounting was had and no record kept of the moneys received or disbursed, and at the request of the district attorney the "army" was disbanded.

A large and successful organization, formed and conducted under the guise of patriotism, is now the subject of investigation by the United States Congress. This organization has announced that its budget for 1918 was upward of $1,200,000, which money was for the ostensible purpose of spreading propaganda throughout the country for our national security and protection. No institution in the entire field have greater promise, by reason of the personnel of its officers, committees, and leading members, of sincerity and honesty of purpose, and none was accorded a more general and liberal support. Twofold, therefore, is the wrong perpetrated by such an institution when it appropriates the funds contributed to it and employs its influence for the advancement of partisan and personal interests in contravention of its avowed intentions and patriotic aims.

These flagrant examples of abuse of public confidence and the misdirection of patriotic impulses call for official scrutiny and control.

VII. Results of the Investigation.

As the investigation progressed and the intricate ramifications and vast proportions of waste and culpability were unfolded, it became apparent that the situation called for drastic and perhaps extra legal remedies for the protection of the public and the successful and honest conduct of war relief work.

For the achievement of this purpose the more available devices seemed to be the immediate warning and education of the public as to the methods employed, the suppression of unworthy and improper activities by prosecution where possible or by pitiless publicity where an element of strict legal proof might be wanting, and the enforcement of restitution of funds fraudulently derived or culpably misappropriated in the conduct of existing charities.

In every case where legal proof was unearthed the facts were immediately presented by the grand jury for action, the defendants placed on trial, and convictions obtained.

As a result of the publicity given to the fraud and waste discovered, 384 out of 534 charities investigated by the district attorney were forced to discontinue their activities, either as corrupt, dishonest, mismanaged, or in fraud of the public. Of the remaining 150 which were found worthy of full or some of public confidence, three-fourths were found to employ some vicious methods of collection, disbursement, accounting, or administration, but all of them cheerfully accepted suggestion and criticism and corrected the abuses pointed out. These societies thus improved continued their activities and achieved useful results.

Many estimable ladies, actuated by lofty motives and at great personal sacrifice, devoting their entire time and energy, and ofttimes their money, were discouraged in their support of unworthy charities and found avenues for the useful expression of their zealous and wholehearted philanthropy. Much difficulty was experienced, however, in convincing some of them of the necessity of discontinuing their pet schemes, as they seemed obsessed with the view that because of some especial virtue in their particular work an exception should be made in their behalf.

In many instances where lack of witnesses, want of proper cooperation from the innocent parties involved, and other tactical reasons made it inadvisable to institute a criminal prosecution, but where moral obliquity was unquestionable, restitution was forced from the offender by the district attorney, and in this manner upward of $250,000 was restored to the charities for which the money was originally intended.

Some institutions which were discontinued under pressure of the investigation were closed out and their assets turned over to worthy charities. In this manner, in a single instance, $5,000 in cash and $35,000 worth of automobiles and goods were realized. Upward of $1,000 was restored to the American Ambulance in Russia; $30,000 realized from the discontinuance of the Drake Section Sanitaire was turned over to the French authorities or refunded to the donors; the firm of Forsyth & Fisk were compelled to return upward of $12,000 to the Seventy-first Regiment; and Mrs. L. L. Daniels and a man named King returned approximately $800 to the War Babies' Cradle.

In many other instances dishonest collectors or fraudulently or improperly conducted institutions were compelled to discontinue their operations and turn over their funds to substantial and reliable societies engaged in war-relief work.

The revelations of imposition, mismanagement, or misconduct in the collection and handling of funds solicited in the names of foreign societies and committees in America, and especialy in New York City, brought these activities to the attention of the foreign Governments and resulted in the suppression of the efforts by the respective Governments as an act of courtesy and respect to the United States. Many of these activities were doing worthy work and were properly administered and controlled, but with the advent of the United States into the world war the allied countries assumed the position that the generosity of the American public should not be diverted from the proper war-relief aims and needs of this country. In this connection the statement of a well-known representative of the British Embassy is of interest:

"I have strongly urged this afternoon to the British authorities here and to Lord Reading, British ambassador to Washington, that such activities * * * should be checked as being open to misconstruction. The American people, as a matter of fact, have been so generous in everything relative to entente relief funds that no appeals whatsoever should be made to them for contributions, save by societies which should receive proper approval and authorization from the local authorities here."

Italy, France, and Belgium adopted the same policy. In this manner the activities of Lady Kingston, wife of the Earl of Kingston, of Kilronian Castle on Shannon, County Roscommon, Ireland, were discontinued, although the lady enjoyed an excellent reputation and no objection to her methods of accounting was found. Lady Kingston's appeals were in behalf of the shamrock fund for disabled Irish soldiers.

The campaign conducted by Lord and Lady Aberdeen, instituted for raising funds for the welfare of Irish and Scotch orphans, was also discontinued at the request of the British Government when it was revealed that the lord and lady were employing the services of an impostor by the name of Carl Diener, and perhaps accepting some part or all of their expenses from the funds contributed.

As the searchlight of the investigation penetrated the dark corners where lurked the fraud, mismanagement, and corruption that were undermining the whole structure of war relief, the social "climber" and the social parasite who promoted waste and invited fraud and profiteering by their inefficiency and mismanagement were driven from the field lest their ambition for social preferment and advantage might lead them to public opprobrium and disgrace.

It is thus evident that the results of the investigation are not to be measured entirely by the court record of the prosecutions instituted and the number of convictions obtained or sentences imposed, but rather that the greater benefit was secured in the revelation of the frauds and vices practiced and indulged in the collection of funds for war relief, and the assistance and stimulus given in the rehabilitation of war relief effort on a constructive and sincere basis. It is, therefore, as a mere incident of this report that the following outline of the specific accomplishments of the investigation is included:

Résumé of the Results of the Investigation.

(1) Five hundred and thirty-four committees, societies, organizations, "funds," or "charities" investigated.

VIII. Frauds Abroad.

As a necessary corollary to the investigation of war charities in America, with the ever-present question as to how the moneys were obtained and applied, the query as to how the funds, amounting to three or four billions of dollars, forwarded abroad have been expended and administered suggests itself with the irresistible suspicion of misapplication and waste.

The venal, incompetent, and dishonest organizations and committees operating in America forwarded their funds, in most instances, to correspondents of their own selection or original alliance, and upon the simple theory that "birds of a feather flock together" it may be inferred, without violence to reason or logic, that irregularities equally as serious would be discovered abroad in these instances.

It is readily apparent that opportunities for investigation and detection with the restraint consequent thereon were better in this country than abroad, and at least an equal amount of irregularity might therefore be the consequence of the lack of this restraint. Throughout the course of the investigation occasional war workers, returning soldiers, and others were interviewed, from whom sidelights on the methods pursued abroad were obtained, and while it may be said in frankness that insufficient information to legally substantiate the charge of corruption abroad was revealed, enough has been said and suggested to support the inference that substantial irregularities exist along the lines deduced from the revelations here. It has been asserted that upward of $50,000,000 has been fraudulently misappropriated or diverted from the funds sent to Europe, and that moneys are even returned to this country for the use of local confederates who had with apparent honesty in their records here forwarded the moneys collected here. It has been confidently asserted that many of the committees to whom funds were forwarded were mere dummies for the American operators and that the funds were misappropriated by the padding of accounts, rebates, commissions on purchases, and the payment of gratuities.

The assertion is publicly made and reiterated that materials actually intended for free distribution among the men in the service have instead been sold to them, often at exorbitant rates and in complete violation of the trust under which they were donated.

The public is entitled to know whether or not these accusations and suspicions are well founded, and if the public generosity and confidence has been betrayed the fact should be fearlessly revealed and the offenders promptly and mercilessly punished.

An investigation along the lines and with a view to the results achieved and methods pursued by the district attorney of New York County should be instituted immediately under the auspices of the Federal Government in cooperation with the district attorney of New York County, from whose jurisdiction so large a proportion of the funds were forwarded, and the results are sure to justify the expense involved and bring to their fruition the efforts expended in the investigation of war-relief work in the city of New York. It is the duty of the district attorney of New York County to take such steps as his jurisdictional limitations will permit to investigate and discover, if possible, whether or not moneys collected within his jurisdiction for war-relief purposes have been misappropriated by any person into whose hands they may have come. Nothing less will satisfy an interested public.

The need for such an investigation has not in any way been lessened by the cessation of hostilities, as relief work is needed even more for our men in the service and the stricken peoples of Europe.

IX. Inadequacy of the Law.

In the absence of legal proof, often difficult of acquirement, the district attorney was powerless to suppress or remedy the abuses discovered by strictly legal means, and except for the power of subpœna and investigation and the aid of the public press, reenforced by public opinion, the excellent results obtained and the vast savings achieved would never have been possible.

The more venal institutions kept no records, either of the persons interested, their officers, or their receipts and disbursements. In failing to make or keep such records no law was violated and no punishment could be meted out. Discovery of crime in such a case was therefore difficult, if not impossible, and only in occasional instances was evidence accidentally secured to justify a conviction. Any person of whatever character was and still is permitted to institute a war charity and to collect funds for war relief; even the identity of some of the principal malefactors can not be discovered.

The legal remedies available at present are the simple provisions of the penal law relating to the misappropriation of funds and the obtaining of money by false pretenses. As the law now stands, the power of the district attorney and the grand jury to investigate for the purpose of discovering the commission of a crime is rendered nugatory by the lack of any law requiring the registration of those engaged in war activities and the keeping and verification of accounts showing the amounts collected and disbursed.

The propriety of remedial legislation could not be more apparent, nor has the necessity therefor been lessened by the cessation of hostilities. So long as the shell-shattered remnants of the peasant homes of Europe remain unrebuilded, or a desecrated art treasure remains unrestored, so long will the appeal be heard and the generosity of America respond for "war relief." The wounded soldier and his dependents, the dependents of those who have died in the service, and even the families of those who fought and returned well, after their death, present a never-ending appeal to the sympathies and appreciation of the public with the everlasting memory of their services in the great world war. So long as any of these objects of popular charity remain, war relief activities will not down.

Little has been done by way of remedial legislation to correct these abuses in any part of the country. The State of Illinois is perhaps the only State in this country that has had any progressive legislation on the question of war-charity control. On July 1, 1917, a law went into effect in that State which places the matters of war charities and solicitations of funds in the hands of the State council of defense and gives that body full power and authority to issue and revoke licenses for the solicitation of funds. No person, society, club, or association is allowed to solicit without first getting a license from the State council of defense, which council is given power and authority to make rules and regulations for the registration of persons engaged in war-relief work and the issuance of licenses thereto. The law further provides that before any person can engage in war-relief work that person must file a statement with the State council of defense, the statement to contain the name of the war charity for which the person desires to solicit, the amount to be raised, the method and channel of raising and distributing the money, the amount of compensation to be paid for subscriptions, and the manner in which the money is to be distributed. The violation of this law is made a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of $1,000.

The Illinois law, however, has been in a way ineffectual, due to the fact that the State council of defense has not made proper provision for the investigation and checking up of the applicants and the verification of the statements filed; also in the matter of providing a sufficient number of investigators to see that the law is not violated. However,, the law is a good one and would be effective if properly prosecuted.

England in the war foresaw these necessities and enacted what is known as a general charities act, which became effective on the 23d day of August, 1916. This legislation seems to have solved the war-relief work situation for England; that is, so far as the protection of the public and the needy beneficiaries are concerned. Briefly, this act provides that it shall be unlawful for any person, committee, or organization to make any appeal to the public for donations or subscriptions in money or in kind for war charities or to raise or attempt to raise money for war charity by conducting a bazaar or entertainment, or by any means, unless the charity is registered. The law further designates the authorities with which charities shall be registered in the various communities, and that the charity can not be registered unless the registering authorities are satisfied that the charity is established in good faith for charitable purposes, and that they will comply with the provisions of the war-charities law.

All charities registered are required to have their funds administered by a committee consisting of not less than three persons. Minutes of the committees are required to be kept and regular meetings held, and a proper audit of the committee's accounts is made mandatory. The manner in which the funds are disbursed is also required to be accounted for before the registrar. When any charity is found to be unworthy the registration is immediately revoked. The law is drastic, and anyone violating any of its provisions can be dealt with in a summary manner, subject to a fine, or given three months' imprisonment at hard labor. Profiteers and other persons, like Mrs. Story, Baroness H———, Countess T———, and thousands of others could not operate under such a law, and for that reason they operated in this country. In fact, Baroness H———, when examined, admitted that she would not be permitted to raise money in England or in France for her own profit, while it was easy to raise money here. In England an appeal from the decision of the registrar is allowed to the commissioner of charities, and under the provisions of the act requiring that a charity be administered by not less than three responsible persons, the possibility of unscrupulous persons soliciting and managing charities has been entirely eliminated.

In New York City on December 3, 1917, an ordinance passed by the board of aldermen became effective. This ordinance requires the manager of a bazaar or other charitable entertainment to obtain a license from the commissioner of licenses and to file with that official a bond to the effect that within 10 days after the entertainment the moneys raised and disbursed will be properly accounted for.

There is now pending before the United States Senate bill No. 4972, introduced by Senator ASHURST. While the presentation of this measure provided encouragement to the expectation that remedial legislation may be enacted by Congress, the bill itself is inadequate, and amplification and amendment are necessary before its operation can promise salutary results. For the effective and proper control of patriotic societies and war-relief organizations there should be Federal regulation and supervision under one of the principal departments of the Federal Government, either the Department of Justice, the Department of the Interior, or the Treasury Department; and such Federal regulation should be supplemented by State and municipal laws. Accordingly, three bills are in the course of preparation in the district attorney's office embodying such provisions as the investigation lately concluded suggests and intended to correct abuses and eliminate the evils revealed, respectively intended for national, State, and municipal enactment. Each of those measures is intended to cover a separate phase of the situation and, when taken together, to complement and supplement each other and thus comprehensively cover the field. For want of a better name the three bills may be referred to as "The charity triplets."

X. RECOMMENDATIONS.

The following recommendations are suggested by a survey of the conduct and results of the investigation:

(1) The management, control, and finances of war charities abroad to which American money was donated should be investigated to the end that culpability may be established and false suspicions dispelled.

(2) Legislation looking to the supervision and control of patriotic societies and war-relief organizations should be enacted by Congress providing for a bureau under the Department of the Interior, which shall have supervision and control over patriotic societies and war-relief organizations. The bureau so created should have the power to formulate rules and regulations for the conduct of its functions and suitable appropriation made for the prosecution of its work.

(a) No person or organization should be permitted to collect or receive funds or distribute mailable matter for patriotic societies or war relief activities except upon the issuance of a license.

(b) No license to be issued except upon the sworn statement of a responsible person or committee who is to be in charge of the conduct of the enterprise, this sworn statement to indicate the names of the organizers, the object of the organization, and the scope of its work.

(c) Each person or society receiving such a license should be required to file with the bureau a semiannual statement under oath giving the names and addresses of all members, the sums of money collected, names and addresses of the contributors, and the amount contributed by each, and an itemized statement of the disbursements made and the purposes thereof.

(d) Copies of all printed appeals for funds or cooperation should be filed within five days after such appeal is made.

(3) Legislation should be enacted in the State of New York embodying provisions similar to those in the Federal enactment covering war relief work.

(a) There should be created in the office of the secretary of state a bureau to supervise war-relief work activities in the State of New York.

(b) No person, committee, or organization engaged in war-relief work should be permitted to operate in the State of New York without first obtaining a license therefor.

(c) No license should be issued except upon the sworn statement of a responsible person or committee who is to be in charge of the conduct of the enterprise, this sworn statement to indicate the names and addresses of the organizers, the object of the organization, and the scope of its work.

(d) Each person or society receiving such a license should be required to file with the bureau a semiannual statement under oath giving the names and addresses of all members, the sums of money collected, names and addresses of the contributors, and the amount contributed by each, and an itemized statement of the disbursements made and the purposes thereof.

(e) Copies of all printed appeals for funds or cooperation issued in the State should be filed within five days after such appeal is made.

(f) The bureau to have the power to immediately revoke the license of any person, committee, or organization collecting funds through the agency of persons employed upon a commission basis, or where the operating expense, as revealed upon investigation or by the semiannual report, exceeds 30 per cent of the gross amount collected.

(g) The violations of any of the provisions of the law should be punishable by an appropriate penalty.

(4) An ordinance should be enacted in the city of New York prohibiting the soliciting of funds, the sale of buttons, tags, and merchandise on the streets, in public places, at public functions, and places of amusement for charity. Suitable exception in the proposed legislation should be provided to cover solicitations on behalf of strictly religious bodies.

The district attorney was greatly assisted in the conduct of the investigation by many interested citizens and officials, to whom he is indebted for many valuable suggestions.

Barry C. Smith, Esq., formerly secretary of the Charity Organization Society, and now director of the National Investigation Bureau, generously gave counsel and attention to the work, which, by reason of his experience and capacity in the field of charitable endeavor, was of especial value throughout the course of the work.

Detective Sergeant Grover Cleveland Brown and August Mayer, detailed by the police department to assist the district attorney throughout the investigation, cleverly ran down the various clues that were from time to time presented for investigation, and their services in securing the attendance of witnesses were invaluable.

Respectfully submitted.

EDWIN P. KILROE,
Assistant District Attorney.

Senate bill No. 4972, covering this subject, was introduced in the Senate by Senator ASHURST, and at the hearing before the Senate Military Committee Mr. Kilroe offered an amended bill as a substitute, for Mr. ASHURST suggested that we might incorporate such a bill for the assistance of the committee. The amended bill was drawn up by the Legislative Drafting Research Board of Columbia College, New York City, and this bill is the one that I now offer for your consideration.

It is true that the law already forbids the use of the mails for fraudulent purposes, but the law should be made more stringent, and should exclude all enterprises whereby an individual or private corporation may make use of same, simply by appearing under the name of some charitable organization, and through fraud and cunning gain the sympathy of the masses and make a selfish use of the moneys so willingly appropriated, and in many cases at a personal sacrifice, by a patriotic people to aid in binding up the wounds of our young heroes here and abroad. There is a crying need for Congress to enact appropriate legislation to encourage and aid those who unselfishly and with no thought of personal gain devote their time and energy to a cause so highly praiseworthy, so entirely humane, a service so vitally important to this and our allied countries—the work of coming to the aid of our wounded and dying heroes and giving them every comfort that the moneys so collected can obtain. On the other hand, this legislation should enforce the punishment of those who are so selfish and so unpatriotic as to prey upon sentiment and use for personal gain the money given out of largeness of heart and purpose—the purpose of the betterment and comfort of those who so willingly have given their all to the cause of democracy.

Mr. Speaker, as a resident of the city of New York, where millions of dollars were collected and swindled, and as the Representative of the Harlem and Heights section of that city, I should like to say that I am heartily in support of this measure. It might be wondered why legislation of this character would now be deemed necessary since the war is substantially concluded. It appears to me that the demand is as great now as during the progress of the war, for there is yet to be administered to our soldier boys much aid, their wants are increasing, and the morale of our Army both here and abroad will necessitate funds to keep it at a proper standard. The war may be over, but our work will not be until the sufferings caused by the war have been in a great measure alleviated and the people of our great country are entitled to the protection that the enactment of the bill in question would afford.

HON. TOM CONNALLY,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make clear my own individual position as regards the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] now under consideration, which reads as follows:

House resolution to authorize the payment of salaries to Members of the House of Representatives withheld during their absence in the military service of the United States.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms and Clerk of the House of Representatives are hereby authorized and directed to immediately pay all arrears of salary and clerk allowance to Members of the House of Representatives of the Sixty-fifth Congress who have not received their monthly salary and allowance owing to their absence from the House while in the military service of the United States during the war: Provided, That there shall be deducted from such amounts for salary, respectively, any money received by any of the above-named as compensation for service in the Army during the present emergency, and the affidavits of the above-named persons shall be accepted as proof as to whether or not any such payment has been received by them.

While I do not assume to censor the conduct of any other Member of this House, I am anxious for the House to know that for myself I neither desire nor will I accept compensation as a Member of Congress while I was serving in the United States Army. When I entered the Army I was willing to accept the reduced pay provided as compensation in the Army. Practically every soldier who joined the colors received less than he did in civil life, and I went no more consideration than was accorded to others in the service.

When I joined the Army I did not expect to be able to return to my seat until the Sixty-sixth Congress should convene. There was no expectation that the war could triumphantly end so soon, and I did not anticipate returning until after the Sixty-fifth Congress should come to an end. However, the sudden cessation of hostilities and the signing of the armistice caused Congress to pass a concurrent resolution directing the Clerk and Sergeant at Arms to place upon the roll all Members who had joined the military service upon their discharge from the service and their return to their seats. Shortly afterwards I was discharged and in conformity to the concurrent resolution returned to my place in this body.

Members of the House will recall that a few days ago the House adopted an amendment to the deficiency appropriation bill providing for the payment of specific amounts to Members who joined the Army as salary while they were absent from the House. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD], who prepared the amendment, exhibited it to me prior to its introduction, and at my request struck from the amendment the sum provided to pay my salary while I was in the military service.

The theory upon which the war was fought by the United States and upon which our military forces were raised was that there rested upon every citizen an equality of obligation to serve in time of war, and recognizing that obligation I will not claim a greater compensation than that provided for those similarly situated in the military service.

The League of Nations.

OF

HON. RICHARD W. AUSTIN,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, Thomas O. Marvin, of Boston, is one of the ablest political and economic writers in New England, if not in the United States, and it gives me pleasure to submit his views on the league of nations to the American Congress.

OUR COVENANT FOR AN ENDURING PEACE—AMERICA NEEDS NO WRITTEN CONTRACT TO HOLD IT TO HIGH IDEALS.

(By Thomas O. Marvin.)

On January 25, 1919, the plenary session of the Paris peace conference, having considered the proposals for the creation of a league of nations, resolved that "it is essential to the maintenance of the world settlement which the associated nations are now met to establish that a league of nations be created to promote international obligations and to provide safeguards against war." After laboring for three weeks over the proposition the commission reported on February 14 the draft of a covenant and constitution for a league of nations. The purpose of this covenant between the nations is "to promote international cooperation and to secure international peace and security." The methods by which this purpose is to be attained are:

1. The acceptance of obligations not to resort to war.
2. The prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations.
3. The firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments.
4. The maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations.

Assent to this covenant by the powers and their signature to the document pledge them to the adoption of the constitution of the league of nations.

It was with mingled sentiments that the draft of a constitution for the league of nations was received throughout the world. Everywhere it was recognized that the ideals involved in a league of nations are in accord with the hopes and aspirations of the world. For centuries men have longed for the day when wars should cease. In the days of Isaiah, the prophet dreamed of the time when "nation shall not lift up sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any more."

In the fourth century before Christ, 12 or more of the ancient cities of Greece formed themselves into the Achæan League for protection from the pirates of the Corinthian Gulf. Like the league now under consideration by the Paris conference the Achæan League had a council of delegates and a popular assembly. It had a secretariat; but also a cavalry commander and admiral. Each city-state that was a member of the league had 1 vote. Internal independence and self-government were retained, but all matters of foreign policy and war were controlled by the league. Power was lodged in the league to summon contingents for the federated army, to impose taxes, and to fine or coerce refractory members. The league was frequently engaged in war and succumbed to the Roman armies in the year 146 B. C.

Three hundred and sixty-six years before Christ the Romans built at the northwest end of the forum a Temple of Concord as evidence of the peaceful aspirations of the mightiest despotism of ancient times. Tiberius, who is reputed to have "reduced Germany almost to the position of a tributary Province," restored the Temple of Concord out of the spoils gained in Germany. And to-day we are once more endeavoring to build a Temple of Concord out of the wreck of the German Empire.

Thirty-one years before Christ was born Agrippa, rejoicing over the defeat of Antony at Actium, exclaimed, "The time of universal peace is near." And so through the centuries of ancient and modern times the dream of universal peace possessed the souls of soldiers and of statesmen.

In the tenth century, after the dismemberment of the empire of Charlemagne, the clergy attempted to institute the peace of the church, under which any form of private warfare was forbidden. Later came the peace of God or the truce of God, which prohibited every act of warfare during the larger part of each year. The means invoked to preserve the peace of the world were spiritual penalties, leagues of peace, and force. In the seventeenth century the truce of God was replaced by a truce of kings. Henry VIII of England and Francis I of France embraced on the Field of Cloth of Gold and vowed unending friendship and peace. Another "great design," credited to the British Prime Minister Sully, though he is reputed to have said that it originated with Queen Elizabeth, proposed the formation of a Christian republic directed by a general council of 60 delegates representing a European confederation of 15 States. In 1713 Saint-Pierre advanced a project for universal peace. Later this project was elaborated by Rousseau into a league of nations to be composed of 19 powers joined in a European republic. The nineteenth century found the dream of a league of nations still seething in the minds of men. In 1804 Czar Alexander I proposed plans of a general pacification and the formation of a league of nations with a new code of international law, sanctioned by the great nations of Europe, any infringement of which would bring upon the culprit the force of the new union. This suggestion of Alexander's led to the formation of the holy alliance, which, like all its predecessors, ended in failure. In its inception, as Prof. W. A. Phillips has said, it was colored by a lofty idealism, but it "ended by stinking in the nostrils of all lovers of liberty." In the latter part of the nineteenth century, while the Franco-Prussian War was raging, Ernest Renan revived the dream of a league of nations. "We shall see the end of war," he claimed, "only when to the principle of nationality is added the principle of a European federation superior to all nationalities." In 1897 Lord Salisbury said, "The federated action of Europe is our sole hope of escaping from the constant terror and the calamity of war." To-day the son of Lord Salisbury, Lord Robert Cecil, represents the British Empire on the commission which has reported to the peace conference a constitution for the league of nations. In 1898 a Russian Czar once more proposed an international conference for the purpose of making "the great idea of universal peace triumph over the elements of trouble and discord." Two international conferences resulted—The Hague peace conventions, one in 1899, at which 26 powers were represented, and another in 1909, attended by 44 powers, practically the entire world. At these conferences courts of arbitration were instituted, and the conference of 1907 agreed to "compulsory arbitration without any restriction" in the interpretation and application of international agreements. This conference, at which practically the entire world was represented, unanimously declared their "firm determination to cooperate in the maintenance of general peace."

Notwithstanding this firm determination to maintain peace, and in spite of the age-long struggle to banish war, the nations that participated in The Hague conventions were, within seven years, at each other's throats, and the most terrible war of all history raged for over four terrifying and devastating years. Have men and nations so changed within the last few years that we can count upon the successful establishment of a new order throughout the world? Have plans that have been tried again and again acquired some new and magical potency? Is the quest for eternal peace at last happily and triumphantly ended?

There is nothing in the proposed constitution of the league of nations to assure us of this gratifying consummation. In fact, the document itself affords evidence of the expectation of future wars in the very means that it sets up to punish a resort to arms.

And here is where the constitution of the league of nations has serious import for the United States. The program of the league is predicated upon the outbreak of future war, and prescribes the duties and the obligations of the members of the league in such an event. Like the Achæan league of the fourth century B. C., which levied contingents from its members for the federated army and possessed the power to coerce refractory members, and like the league of nations expounded by Rousseau in the eighteenth century, which provided for armed action to be taken jointly and at common expense, this new league stipulates that the disregarding of its covenants will be regarded as an act of war, and empowers the executive council in such cases to recommend what effective military or naval force the members of the league shall contribute to protect the covenants of the league.

In joining the league the United States becomes bound to equip and dispatch a military or a naval force at the summons of the executive council of the league, no matter how remote the seat of trouble or how foreign the dispute is to our people or to the interests of our Government. There are major problems that involve the peace of Europe and the security of nations that the United States can never look upon with unconcern, in the issue of which we can never again pretend to be neutral, and in the settlement of which we shall never again be too proud to fight. But we need no binding contract of league or covenant to hold us to this purpose. All we need is to prevent the reestablishment in power of another timorous and pacifist administration. The blood of Americans spilled so lavishly on the fields of France is our pledge and covenant. We have given more than our word—we have given the lives of our sons. We have written the compact with a flaming sword and sealed it with our blood. In face of that immortal and immutable fact, how puny is the program of the Wilson commission on a league of nations, how paltry the pledges and platitudes of their widely heralded constitution.

We drew the sword once when the liberties of the world were imperiled, and if civilization is ever endangered again we will draw it once more, and without waiting for nearly three years to do it. Next to the pitiful reflection upon the character of America by those years of doubt and waiting is this new urgency, by the man who delayed to act, that we pledge ourselves in advance to mix up in any trouble or embroilment that breaks out anywhere on the scarred and sodden surface of the globe.

There are myriad possibilities for trouble. All central Europe and much of Asia are seething with turmoil and unrest. If the help of America is needed, it will be freely given, but we have earned the right to ask Europe and Asia to adjust their troubles and put their houses in order. If we are to set up mandatories for the islands of the sea, let us demand mandatories for the troublous continents of earth. The United States, Canada, Argentina, Brazil, and Chile would assume the responsibilities of mandatories for the American continents. We have done so ourselves to no inconsiderable extent by our Monroe doctrine. Let England, France, and Italy become mandatories for Europe. If they can not handle the job, then let them call on Uncle Sam.

So long as we retain the spirit of Chateau-Thierry, of Belleau Wood, and of the Argonne no power on earth will break loose in the madness of war without first taking into most serious and respectful consideration the possible action of the United States.

It is not a written covenant between various nations, it is not a constitution of a league of nations, that will guarantee the peace of the world. More potent far is the lesson of Germany's utter failure and the memory of what our boys did over there. The only security for the peace of the world is the power of the nations that believe in peace and that have demonstrated that they can enforce it. No written compact can have the potency of a trained and disciplined army of liberty-loving men. No covenant of statesmen can offer the guaranty for peace that is afforded in the hundred millions of free citizens of America. This is what we should covet for the United States—the respect and honor of law-abiding nations and the fear of brigands who would disturb the peace of the world.

In this can we find the surest promise and covenant of enduring peace on earth.

A young wife asked a bachelor friend if he had ever thought seriously about marriage. "Certainly not," he replied; "no man thinks seriously about marriage until after it has happened." America must not wait to think seriously about the league of nations until after it has happened. Now, while the constitution of a league is under discussion by the peace conference, is the time to discuss it, to think seriously about it, and to consider the responsibilities and obligations which it imposes upon the United States.

"God grants liberty," said Daniel Webster, "only to those who love it and are always ready to guard and defend it. It is my living sentiment, and, by the blessing of God, it shall be my dying sentiment—independence now and independence forever," rang out his eloquent and patriotic challenge.

America, with all it stands for, has cost too much in struggle and sacrifice, in wounds and death and high endeavor, to surrender its power, its authority, or its sovereignty to any superstate. Untrammeled, unawed, and unafraid, America can best fulfill its destiny and best serve the world by following its own distinct lines of development, free from the entanglements of permanent alliances.

We should enter no league that will hamper in any way our economic development or exercise authority over our domestic or foreign trade. We should be no part of a league that can order the removal of economic barriers and place our industries and our workingmen in competition with nations whose cost of production is lower than ours. We have grown strong and prosperous by adhering for the most of our history to policies definitely designed to encourage and diversify our industries, and the results of this policy are written to-day in American triumphs in war and peace. Our victories were won not by our officers and soldiers alone but by the cooperation of our captains of industry and our workingmen. The German menace was destroyed by our factories and workshops as well as by our armies, and these factories and workshops were made possible by the protective policy advocated by George Washington and Alexander Hamilton.

Woodrow Wilson himself has said that "nobody now doubts that the policy of Hamilton put the Nation under a great stimulation, gave it the economic independence it needed, immensely quickened the development of its resources and the powers of its people." We need the wise and resolute application of that same patriotic policy to-day, and we should not consent to incorporation in any league that would retard the stimulation of American enterprise, that would exercise authority over the development of our resources, or that would impair or abridge our economic independence.

No compact should be signed with foreign nations that will diminish our authority over domestic affairs. No contract should be entered into which will permit the majority vote of any league to order our ships and soldiers into the bloody embroilment of foreign wars, in the issues of which American interests are not at stake. We should remain the masters of our destiny, the sovereign power over our own dominions, free to throw the might of the Nation into the scales of war when American rights are ruthlessly assailed, when justice is outraged, or the peace of the world is threatened. America has demonstrated that it can play an effective rôle as the peacemaker of the world. No nation and no group of nations will start anything for another century without taking into consideration what the United States will do. After our recent demonstration of America's power we do not need to enter a league of nations to make our voice heard or our influence felt.

Washington's advice is as potent now as it ever was. "It is our true policy," he declared, "to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world." Temporary alliances for national purposes or to achieve some great object essential to the welfare of the world are not discountenanced nor prohibited, but we are warned against permanent alliances such as we are urged to-day to enter into. When a similar program was proposed in Daniel Webster's time he declared in a speech in the House of Representatives that "these doctrines are totally hostile to the fundamental principles of our Government."

Grover Cleveland, whose sturdy democracy was never questioned, said:

"The genius of our institutions, the needs of our people in their home life, and the attention which is demanded for the settlement and development of the resources of our vast territory dictate the scrupulous avoidance of any departure from that foreign policy commended by the history, the traditions, and the prosperity of our Republic. It is the policy of independence favored by our position and defended by our known love of justice and by our own power. It is the policy of peace suitable to our interests. It is the policy of Monroe and of Washington and Jefferson: 'Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations; entangling alliances with none.'"

In a speech in Des Moines, Iowa, on February 1, 1916, Woodrow Wilson, who possibly had in mind the advice of Jefferson and Cleveland as well as Washington, said:

"There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before—seek entanglement in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water; abandon its habitual and traditional policy and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now engulfing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standard of citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I for one can not subscribe to those sentiments."

And yet in a little over a year the author of these words stood at the Speaker's desk in the House of Representatives and declared that a state of war existed between Germany and the United States; and to-day he is preaching that we "abandon our habitual and traditional policy" and "deliberately engage" in the promotion of a league of nations.

"I do not know what the standard of citizenship of these gentlemen may be," but I do know that they are not the standards of Washington, Jefferson, Webster, or Cleveland, and, as President Wilson said only three years ago, "I only know that I for one can not subscribe to them."

Not long ago a chauffeur was brought into court after having run down a man. "Didn't you know that if you struck this pedestrian he would be seriously injured?" asked the judge. "Yes, sir," replied the chauffeur. "Then why didn't you zigzag your car and miss him?"

"He was zigzagging himself and outguessed me, your honor," was the answer. Modern statesmanship, as practiced by a distinguished exponent of the art, seems to consist of an elaborate system of zigzagging. There is truer Americanism, a finer patriotism, and better statesmanship in the toast proposed by Robert C. Winthrop at Faneuil Hall, July 4, 1845:

"Our country—however bounded or described—still our country, to be cherished in all our hearts, and to be defended by all our hands.

"The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battle field and patriot grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land will ever renew our love of country, kindle our pride in its achievements, and inspire us with confidence in its destiny. To be an American; to fulfill to the utmost the obligations of American citizenship—what nobler task can we undertake; what higher service can we perform for the world? Since our flag was first flung to the breeze it has been to the world the emblem of liberty and the symbol of hope. America does not need to change to be of service to the world. All we need to do is to be true to ourselves, and by so doing will we best serve mankind.

"O flag of sacrifice and chivalry,
Never before so dear! Your holy red,
Dyed with the blood of hero friends; your white,
Clear like their vision; and your starry field,
Steadfast with life devotion! Not again,
I think, shall I look out upon the world
But through the folds of your eternal glory.
Flash your fair challenge still across my window,
Flag of my country."

River and Harbor Bill—Some Essentials for Enlarged Use of Channels for Water Transportation—Obstacles which Exist—Remedies Discussed.

SPEECH

HON. JOHN H. SMALL,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, January 2, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, the committee presents the annual river and harbor bill. I use the word "annual" advisedly because there is no one of the appropriation bills where the necessity for an annual bill is greater than this for the maintenance and further improvement of rivers and harbors and the adoption of new projects. Since 1910 we have had an annual river and harbor bill for each recurring fiscal year. There is no budget, if it may be so termed, presented for any of the activities of the Government which is examined more carefully and which is presented to the House with stronger evidence, more complete in every respect, than are the estimates submitted for the maintenance and further improvement of rivers and harbors. As is well known, the country is divided into engineering districts of which usually an Army engineer is in charge. He submits estimates for all improvements within his district. Those estimates are forwarded to the Chief of Engineers, and in his office are carefully considered and frequently pruned before they are presented to the Congress and later for the consideration of the committee, and in the consideration of those estimates by the committee the Chief of Engineers or his representative is present to testify and be examined by members of the committee regarding each recommendation for an appropriation to be included in the bill, and in this bill the committee gave careful consideration to every item. A representative of the Chief of Engineers, familiar with all the official reports and the conditions of improvement throughout the country, was present to testify and to fortify the recommendations which have been made. When the committee came to the consideration of this bill, they were confronted primarily by the query as to what should be their policy. The last two river and harbor bills were reported and enacted by Congress during the stress of war. The appropriations for maintenance and further improvement were reduced to the lowest limit; to use a familiar expression, they were "cut to the bone."

In some instances the estimates were insufficient for the maintenance of projects. As to new projects, in the last two river and harbor bills only such new projects were included as were intimately associated with the prosecution of the war. In the determination of that condition investigation was had by the Secretary of War, by the Chief of Engineers, and carefully considered by the committee, and in each of the last two bills therefore new projects were reduced to a minimum. In endeavoring to arrive at a conclusion which should be wise and just to the country as to the policy to be followed in the formulation of this bill the chairman and other members of the committee consulted the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Chief of Engineers, and many Members of the House, and the final conclusion was that the bill should carry appropriations for maintenance sufficient to maintain all completed channels throughout the country; that as to projects which had been theretofore adopted and not completed the bill should carry appropriations for every improvement in such amount as could be wisely and economically expended to the end of the next fiscal year. The committee were then confronted with the policy as to new projects, and after very careful deliberation it was finally decided that we should adopt such new projects as were meritorious and urgent, and as a result the committee have selected some new projects which are included in the bill. The chairman of the committee believes that he can state in all frankness that there is no new project in the bill which can not be justified in the public interest. This is not a bill formulated by the chairman of the committee; it is a bill formulated by the committee itself. I would be uncandid if I stated that the committee were unanimous in every respect regarding every appropriation or every new project in the bill. Fair, intelligent men, desirous of discharging their public duty, will disagree as to details, but every item in the bill providing for a new project received the approval of the committee, and they are ready at the proper time to justify their judgment and to ask the approval of the House. It is my purpose to occupy only a brief time in discussing the items in the bill. I desire to discuss some of the general phases of harbors and waterways that are connected with the transportation and commerce of the country. I suggest that Members who may have inquiries to make regarding particular projects defer those inquiries until we take up the bill for reading under the five-minute rule.

Water transportation is one of the essential instrumentalities of the transportation system in our country. We have the highways, the railways, and the waterways, which substantially constitute the trinity. Is there anyone who will question the proposition that waterways are a very essential element in our transportation system? I think not. Even during recent years, when river and harbor bills have been under criticism, the criticism was not directed to the basic proposition that they were essential in our system of transportation, but to the alleged fact that the river and harbor bills contained appropriations for some improvements which could not be justified in the public interest.

The purpose of river and harbor legislation in the improvement of rivers and harbors is to afford additional facilities for transportation, and I will state frankly that no appropriation for an improvement which is not used or will be used for purposes of transportation can be justified as an appropriation of the public revenue. We ought to remember, with regard to our waterways, particularly interior waterways, that providing channels alone does not make for transportation upon those channels. That is a vital mistake which many advocates of water improvement in the past have made. They have vigorously contended that improvements be adopted by Congress and appropriations made therefor, and have too often forgotten to stress the question of whether those channels would be used after they were improved, and the criticism of river and harbor bills in the past, wherever justified, has been based upon the neglect to weigh properly the question of whether the improved channels would be used after they were once improved. There are some essentials which are necessary upon which to predicate the use of improved channels. Of course, everyone will agree that in the first place there must be a demand for the movement of traffic and of such traffic as would ordinarily seek waterways by preference. Having satisfied ourselves that the demand for the movement of traffic exists, it will next be agreed that we ought to have boat lines; that transportation corporations should be organized, properly equipped with ample capital, and with officials acquainted with the needs of transportation for their management.

Often on some of our interior waterways the kind of boats which have been in use have been uneconomical, have been unfitted for the particular service in which they were engaged, and therefore did not sufficiently attract traffic, nor could they be operated with profit.

Another essential for the proper development of waterway transportation is the interchange of traffic between boat lines and rail lines. Unless this can be effected the commerce upon waterways will continue to be local—that is to say, originating at one point upon the river and destined for another point thereon. There ought to be an interchange of traffic and a prorating of freight rates, so that traffic may be initiated upon a railroad, thence go to the nearest point upon the waterway, and thence be transported by water to its destination, or, vice versa, be initiated upon the water lines and thence transferred to the railroad.

What have been the chief elements in the upbuilding of our great system of rail transportation? It has been brought about by their standardization, standardization of the width of rails, the standardizing of cars, so that any freight car or any passenger car upon any railroad in the country can be moved upon any other railroad in the country. And in addition the railroads have established as between themselves a system of prorating. Without this standardization of equipment, without this system of prorating of traffic, this great system of movement by rail, the greatest in any country in the world, could not have been established upon our railroads in the United States.

Neither can we develop water transportation unless the same facilities are extended to water lines as are extended between different lines of railroads.

There is another essential. We must have water terminals. At every town and city, even at every landing along an interior waterway, there must be some sort of terminal adequate to the needs of the traffic involved in order to promote water transportation. Everyone is familiar with the relation of rail terminals to the proper use of railroads, and water terminals are just as, if not more, essential to the proper development of water transportation than are rail terminals for the railroads.

We submitted an inquiry just before the last bill was presented to the House as to the status of publicly owned terminals upon the great Ohio River. While I can not say that the report was a surprise, at least to some members of the committee, yet it did surprise the country to learn that upon that great river, upon which we have expended millions of dollars and will expend millions more, there was not a single adequate public terminal constructed, owned, and managed by municipalities or other public agencies in the interest of the public. I shall refer directly to a later report from the Chief of Engineers, submitted by direction of a provision in the last river and harbor act, upon the Ohio River.

May I, at the expense of repetition, describe briefly some of the essentials of a water terminal? There must, of course, be ample area in water front. There must be a capacious warehouse suited to the business. That terminal must be physically connected by a belt-line railroad with all the railroads serving the community. It should be equipped with modern appliances for the transfer of traffic between the boats and the warehouse or the rail car, respectively.

Without such a terminal, even local traffic loaded upon the boat at the point of origin and unloaded from the boat at the point of destination can not be economically prosecuted. And as to an interchange of traffic with the railroads, it will be apparent that there can be none unless we have such terminal connected with all the railroads serving the community. And where there are no railroads there should be good highways constructed and radiating out into all the area from which traffic may be expected to move by water, and these highways are absolutely essential for the proper conduct of water transportation.

I would like now to refer briefly to some of the obstacles which have existed in the past, and to some extent in the present, to the development of water transportation. In the early days, when railroads were constructed parallel to interior rivers, they deemed themselves competitors of the waterways, and in many instances they reduced freight rates for the purpose not of competing with but of making unprofitable the operation of boat lines. In other instances, either alone or in addition to the other activities on their part, they bought existing boat lines and managed them in such a way that traffic would not be attracted; that they would be operated unprofitably; and ultimately sold the boat lines, so that the river was deprived of the facilities of transportation.

In the Panama Canal act of 1912 Congress thought it had provided a remedy for that evil. In that act is a provision forbidding any railroad which had reduced its rates competitive with water lines to advance those rates except with the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. That is in the original act. It was not inserted in the Panama Canal act. It was in existence prior to that act.

Mr. SMALL. I was under a different impression, but the gentleman is so familiar with that that I yield to his superior information on the subject. At any rate, it is the law.

Mr. ESCH. That is right.

Mr. SMALL. We thought we had provided a remedy for this evil, but, unfortunately, the results have not justified the expectations. To such an extent, in my opinion, have the expectations failed to materialize, that it has seemed to me that the railroads, for the purpose, in their opinion, of monopolizing traffic competitive with the waterways, have been content to maintain those reduced rates and the original evil has found no remedy.

Another obstacle has been found in the indisposition of many of the managers of railroads to interchange traffic with the water lines. I would like to give you an illustration of that. As I said, the last river and harbor act contained a provision directing the Chief of Engineers to investigate terminals upon the Ohio River between Pittsburgh and Cairo.

I have a proof copy of the report, which will soon be available to the Members of the House; and, by the way, I wish to commend the reading of this report to those gentlemen who desire information upon the question of waterway transportation and suggestions as to its betterment. It is known as House Document 1521, Sixty-fifth Congress, third session. It contains the report of the Chief of Engineers, and also quite an able report by Col. Lansing H. Beach, division engineer at Cincinnati, Ohio. The last river and harbor act directed an investigation as to the status of water terminals at cities and towns along the Ohio River between Pittsburgh and Cairo, and whether the same are satisfactory as to location, construction, and equipment. There is a table here, containing a number of exhibits giving information as to the status of the terminals along the Ohio River, which is most instructive. Table No. 1 gives the names of cities and towns where an interchange of traffic exists between water transportation lines and the railroads. Table No. 2 gives a list of water transportation lines existing and proposed on the Ohio River, with a description of the number and type of boats in operation and under construction or to be constructed, and as to whether the same are appropriate and suitable for the traffic. Table No. 3 gives the rail rates on coal from and through Cincinnati. Table No. 4 quotes the freight rates applying on coal produced in the Kanawha district, West Virginia. Table No. 5 gives the names of coal elevators at present and formerly located on the Ohio side of the Ohio River.

The committee selected the Ohio River because it is one of the important interior rivers. On it are located many important cities like Pittsburgh, Louisville, Cincinnati, and other cities and towns. Congress has adopted a project for the improvement of that river by a system of locks and dams at an aggregate cost of more than $60,000,000, and the work is now in process of construction.

If we can not develop water transportation upon the Ohio River consistent with the traffic to be moved and the facilities offered, there are certainly very few rivers in the United States where it can be so promoted and effected.

I would like to call your attention to just a few extracts from this report as to the Ohio River regarding terminals. I read:

> Through bills of lading, as far as can be ascertained, are not issued by any water transportation line on the Ohio River or by any railroad reaching the banks of that stream on freight to be carried by both water and rail.

Upon that great river, with the number of existing water lines, in the face of the proposition which I believe will be conceded by everyone that interchange of traffic between railroads and water lines is absolutely essential for any healthy water transportation, there is absolutely no interchange of traffic between any water transportation line on the Ohio River and any railroad intersecting any of the cities and towns along that great stretch of river. That fact ought to be impressive, and if this is one of the essentials, then it follows either that existing law is not observed or that adequate laws have not been enacted.

Mr. ESCH and Mr. GARD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ESCH. I understand that the Director General has ordered through rates—rail and water—on the traffic on the lower Mississippi River, and has also directed that this traffic should move with through bills of lading, due to the fact that they have now established a suitable line of boats. Is there such a line of boats on the Ohio River? If there is not, that may account for the fact that there are no bills of lading and no through joint rates.

Mr. SMALL. There are a number of boat lines, not in all respects adequate nor of the number which certainly will be required when the improvement of the river is completed. But the difficulty does not lie in the absence of boat lines.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman intend to give us the benefit of his suggestions about the interchange of traffic on the Ohio River with reference to more complete use and benefit?

Mr. SMALL. In a moment, I do.

Now, calling attention further to this interchange of traffic on page 5, under the subheading (e), "Any recommendation for the development of transportation on such river," I read:

> There are two or three features connected with the development of transportation on the Ohio River which, it is believed, should receive careful consideration by the proper authorities before it will be possible to secure navigation on any river to the extent which the capacity of our waterways and the expenditures already made by Congress justify but which can be confidently expected if obstacles willfully thrown in the way of such traffic can be removed.
> The Pittsburgh & Cincinnati Packet Co., operating a line of packet boats on the Ohio River between Pittsburgh and Cincinnati, was a most flourishing organization, doing an extensive business, until the Interstate Commerce Commission some years ago issued directions that the railroads should not prorate with the steamboat lines. The company practically went out of business in one day as a result of this order.

And may I, just at this moment, stop to call attention to the fact that here is a demonstration of the truth of the proposition that interchange of traffic between boat lines and the railroads is essential to the maintenance of a healthy water transportation? Continuing the reading from the report.

> It is understood that this order was issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the reason that it did not have supervision over water carriers, and by inserting a water route on the line of freight movement the railroads were enabled to avoid interstate commerce rulings. That condition has now disappeared, for by the Panama Canal act that body is given supervision over water carriers in the same manner and to the same extent that it has supervision over the railroads. Unfortunately this provision is permissive and not mandatory, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has not as yet exercised its power over the water carriers. It is believed that the supervision and regulation should be mandatory. It should also have authority to prescribe minimum rates on water as well as the maximum rates. The necessity for this is due to the fact that in case railroads have established steamboat lines or acquired control over existing lines and then placed such low charges for handling of freight that other boats were driven from the river, when the railroad-controlled boats would then be withdrawn or operated in such manner as to prevent freight movement by water. Steamboat owners themselves have also indulged in the same practices. Were the steamboats prevented from adopting too low a rate, this method of interference with navigation would be avoided.
> 15. The railroads and water carriers should be required to issue through bills of lading, good by both kinds of carriers, and under proper terms for prorating. The result of present conditions is that the boats are practically able to handle only local freight, and that through freight can not frequently be shipped by the route which would be most economical and advantageous. An instance of this is the distribution of coal from Cincinnati.

And I call the attention of the House to this statement in the report, which I will now read:

> That city was formerly a large distributing point for coal brought to it by water, but upon the completion of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad to that point from the West Virginia coal fields, rates from Cincinnati were so advanced that river coal was to a large extent deprived of the territory which it formerly enjoyed. The matter has been consistently pursued by the railroads and every opportunity taken to advance rail rates on coal coming from the river, until the distribution of coal from Cincinnati is now almost prevented. Table No. 3 gives the rates which existed on coal from Cincinnati to various points before the completion of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, the advance on river coal which followed immediately upon the completion of that railroad, and the all-rail rates, showing that the rates on river coal are much heavier proportionately than the all-rail rates. A concrete instance or two make this plain. Recently the through rate on coal from either the Logan fields or the Kanawha district to Toledo, Ohio, was $1.55 per ton.

That is the all-through rate.

> Of this amount it is understood that the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad received 67.2 cents per ton. The rate on river coal from Cincinnati to Toledo is, however, $1.50 per ton. The rate on coal from the Jellico field on the Louisville & Nashville Railroad through Cincinnati to Indianapolis, Ind., was $1.55 per ton, and of this amount the Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland & St. Louis Railway received $0.50 per ton for its haul from Cincinnati to destination. The rate from Cincinnati to Indianapolis on coal coming from the river was $0.60 per ton.

And then this report refers to General Order No. 28 of the Railroad Administration, providing for an increase in freight rates. It states that in making these increases the rates were disproportionately advanced on river coal from Cincinnati compared with all-rail coal from the mine fields to the same locality.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] asked what is the remedy for this condition. We must look upon water transportation as an essential and integral factor in our system of transportation. It must have the protection of law and the force of public sentiment behind it. No one doubts that we need these additional facilities. That fact has been acutely emphasized during this war, and upon a number of occasions in times of peace, and it will be again emphasized in the future.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the gentleman leaves the Ohio River question, I observe that there is no direct appropriation carried in this bill. Will the gentleman explain the reason for that?

Mr. SMALL. The reason is that there is nearly $10,000,000 on hand and available, which the Chief of Engineers reported represented all that could be profitably expended until the end of the next fiscal year on that improvement. If the present estimate is revised and an appropriation recommended, it can be inserted as an amendment by the Senate. Further investigation is now in progress.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So that the failure to appropriate in this bill will cause no delay whatever in the construction of the locks and dams?

Mr. SMALL. None whatever.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to make it clear that the fact that there is no appropriation carried in this bill does not by any means imply that that project is going to be slighted or that there will be less speed in its completion.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is correct. That is the attitude of the committee, and so far as I know it is the attitude of Congress.

May I say with regard to the Ohio River that at the instance of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors correspondence has been had during the past year with the mayors of all the cities and principal towns, and the presidents and secretaries of all commercial organizations, in which representations were made that local cooperation must be had in providing steamboat lines, in the construction of adequate water terminals, and in making applications for interchange of traffic between the boat lines and the railroads. It is gratifying to state that very substantial and encouraging responses have been made to the appeals contained in this correspondence, and in many of the cities and towns along the river active steps are in progress in the making of plans for terminals and in the consideration of the construction of additional boats; and if this fine civic spirit continues it is believed that by the time the improvement of the river is completed to Cincinnati, which should be effected certainly within two years if not earlier—and the entire improvement completed within several years thereafter—there will be sufficient boat lines and adequate terminals at all of the principal towns and cities along the river. It is most gratifying to make that statement. There is much to be done and much need for the continuance of this civic activity, but certainly a most auspicious beginning has been made.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I take pleasure in yielding to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Since the adoption of this project in 1910 each appropriation bill has carried an item for the river, this year being the first year when the appropriation has been omitted. I should like to have the gentleman make it clear that this is not to be regarded as a precedent for the future by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors or by Congress in dealing with the Ohio River.

Mr. SMALL. In answer to the gentleman I can state that so far as I am aware—and I think I express the sentiments of the committee—there is no intention to abandon or to lessen the annual appropriation for the improvement of the Ohio River. And further, as explaining why there is no appropriation in this bill, I will say that during the progress of the war it has been impossible to secure contracts for the construction work upon the Ohio River. Contractors who entered into their contracts prior to our entry into the war have lost large sums of money. I am informed that some of them have become bankrupt. In the last river and harbor bill there was a provision authorizing the Secretary of War to consider and to do justice to these contractors by readjusting their contract prices wherever it seemed necessary, in order to avoid the perpetration of flagrant injustice; but unfortunately that was only effective from the date of the approval of the bill. I thought then that if we were going to do exact justice we ought to make this principle retroactive and applicable to all contracts entered into from the time we entered the war; because those contractors who were more honest and diligent proceeded more rapidly with their contracts, and they have been penalized to that extent by the great losses which they have suffered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate that at the time the estimates were sent in by the Chief of Engineers of the War Department, upon which this bill was framed, the country was at war, and it was not reasonably contemplated that more than the $9,000,000 on hand could be expended on the Ohio River during the coming fiscal year. But since the estimates were sent in by the War Department, the war has ended, and in view of the fact that many engineers and experts in the War Department and in the Army are to return soon to the United States, where their services ought to be available for public improvements, does not the gentleman think it is possible that the amount of money now available for the work on the Ohio River will not be sufficient to carry on the work during the coming fiscal year; and even if it is, does not the gentleman think there ought to be certainly available an amount sufficient to enable the Government to take advantage of the expert knowledge and experience of these engineers who are soon to return to the United States by their employment in the construction of these locks and dams?

Mr. SMALL. I will say in response to the gentleman that he will find in the hearings regarding appropriations in the bill that Gen. Taylor, assistant to the Chief of Engineers on river and harbor matters, was questioned fully regarding the needs of the Ohio River, and his final conclusion was that the amount on hand was all that could properly be expended in the next fiscal year. But, as before stated, this phase is being reinvestigated.

Mr. BARKLEY. And did he not state further that he was making investigation, in view of the new conditions developed, with a view of recommending an increased amount if he found it necessary?

Mr. SMALL. If he makes any such recommendation before the bill passes the House, the committee will be called together, and I have not the slightest doubt but that the committee will authorize the chairman to offer a committee amendment, or the amendment can be made by the other body.

Mr. DIXON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. The action of the committee was based entirely on the recommendations of the engineer?

Mr. SMALL. Entirely; there is not an appropriation in the bill which was not recommended by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. DIXON. And the engineer said that the amount available was ample to cover all that could be used for the coming year.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. In the river and harbor act of 1917 there is a section authorizing a waterways commission to be appointed to furnish information to Congress. Has the committee received the benefit of any information or report from that waterways commission?

Mr. SMALL. The commission has not been appointed. The committee has no information as to the intention of the President in this respect. If the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that it ought to be appointed earlier than seems now apparent, and that the commission is in the public interest, and he should request it, the chairman might go with him to the President and request early action.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman, however, if he knows what influence there is, or the reason why this commission has not yet been appointed?

Mr. SMALL. The only information I have is that during the early part of last summer or spring, at the instance of some Members, I asked the President when he intended to appoint the commission, and he replied substantially that there seemed to be no necessity for haste during the pendency of the war.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose the gentleman will agree that the various topics which he has discussed in his very illuminating address might well receive the consideration of a body such as Congress provided for in that act, and particularly with respect to coordinating State and municipal activities. Does not the gentleman think that many of these engineers will be relieved from war activities so that they might find sufficient personnel to provide for that commission?

Mr. SMALL. Doubtless a commission will be appointed, but when it will be appointed I have no information. The gentleman is correct that the commission authorized in the river and harbor act of 1917 will consider these questions to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. WALSH. From information the gentleman has received from the Executive, he is sure that Congress has not done a vain thing in providing for the appointment of such a commission?

Mr. SMALL. I doubt if either the gentleman or myself feels any undue enthusiasm over the appointment of the commission or over its prospective report.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. FESS. Reverting to the cooperative plan which the gentleman mentioned a moment ago, is that official or purely voluntary?

Mr. SMALL. If the gentleman refers to local cooperation by providing a part of the cost of the improvement, I may say that sometimes it is voluntary and sometimes attached as a condition of the appropriation. On the Pacific coast they have the finest cooperative spirit of any section of the country. On the Pacific coast in some of their improvements they voluntarily cooperate.

Mr. FESS. It is likely that the Government will inaugurate a policy of making cooperative conditions?

Mr. SMALL. This matter of cooperation involves many difficulties. I doubt very much if any arbitrary rule for local cooperation could be established. I am inclined to the opinion that local cooperation must depend on the conditions surrounding every improvement. There are some public improvements where in the opinion of the Chief of Engineers, always concurred in by the committee, local cooperation is advisable and sometimes essential. In others it is apparent that the improvement is in the public interest, but if local cooperation is required it will virtually prevent the improvement.

Mr. FESS. Does local cooperation ever extend to State cooperation?

Mr. SMALL. Sometimes, but ordinarily not. Ordinarily the local cooperation is confined to municipalities, and sometimes to counties.

Mr. FESS. Does the chairman of the committee see insuperable obstacles to making State cooperation a condition for Federal appropriation for rivers and harbors?

Mr. SMALL. I do believe that the difficulties of securing any general plan of State cooperation are very great and substantially impracticable.

Mr. FESS. I will say to the gentleman that I have had some trepidation, as the gentleman knows, in voting for some of these appropriations, but I have thought that if there could be worked out a system of State cooperation between the States and the Federal Government much of that opposition to the appropriations would be eliminated. I am not sure whether it is totally insuperable or whether it is practicable.

Mr. SMALL. I am afraid that it is not practicable. As an illustration, in the gentleman's own State there has been agitated for some years a waterway, partly artificial, connecting Lake Erie and the Ohio River. Personally I believe the improvement will sometime in the future be made.

Mr. FESS. That is along the river bed of the Beaver River?

Mr. SMALL. In part. The proposed route has never been definitely established, so we might refer to it as connecting the Ohio River with Lake Erie. It would connect the Great Lakes with the Ohio River, near which is the greatest coke and steel producing region in the United States, a comparatively dense population, a large volume of traffic, both raw material and finished production to be moved, and it would seem that the project would sometime in the future get favorable consideration. Yet it is generally conceded that it is a project where local cooperation ought to exist, and the gentleman will find in his own State in sections remote from the territory contiguous to this proposed waterway quite serious opposition to any cooperation. I mention that as an illustration of one of the difficulties of getting State cooperation. Unfortunately in appropriations and the issuing of bonds by States we do not think as State units, but we think rather as sectional units of the same State.

In conclusion I wish to make a brief expression regarding some of the remedies for these conditions which exist as obstacles to water transportation. Col. Lansing H. Beach, who is a very able engineer and who is very familiar with conditions on the Ohio River and other interior rivers in the Mississippi Valley, makes these recommendations in his report:

1. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be required to exercise the same supervision over movement by water carriers as it now does by rail.
2. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be authorized to fix a minimum rate for movement of freight by water as well as a maximum rate.
3. That all common carriers, whether operating by water or by rail, be required to issue through bills of lading and prorate on such terms as the Interstate Commerce Commission or other established authority may prescribe as just and equitable.

Without having given those recommendations as careful study as they deserve, I am inclined to the opinion that they represent, in the main, wise thoughts upon the subject. A great many, if not most, of the men engaged in water transportation throughout the United States are opposed to any governmental supervision. They think they ought to operate as free lances, charging as low rates as they choose, consistent with the cost of movement, and advancing them whenever the conditions of traffic justify. It seems to me the time has come, however, when we must stabilize and standardize the movement of traffic by water just as we have endeavored to do by rail, and this is particularly true as to water transportation lines upon navigable rivers, where there is an interchange of traffic between the railroads and the waterways. In any event I believe Congress should at the earliest possible time amend the existing law authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission to provide for interchange of traffic and to fix a prorating between boat lines and railroads, so that, instead of being permissive, it shall be mandatory, and so that such an anomalous and unjustifiable and inexcusable condition as now exists upon the Ohio River, where there is absolutely no interchange of traffic between any railroad or boat lines, shall be relegated to the past. I am sure that this suggestion is a wise one and ought to have the attention of Congress.

I submit one other suggestion: We have a Department of Commerce. That department has virtually no official jurisdiction over the movement of commerce by water or by rail.

Our Army engineers are equipped, and there is no higher authority for making investigations regarding the improvement of harbors and all interior waterways and reporting as to their feasibility and desirability from an engineering viewpoint, and for making estimates of the cost of the same. It is rather beyond the scope of their training, however, that they should pass upon the commercial necessity of their improvement. I think perhaps that we might well create in the Department of Commerce a bureau with limited jurisdiction over the movement of freight by water, not to interfere with any existing or prospective jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Let me illustrate: Take the Ohio River, about which so much has been said. If we had in the Department of Commerce a bureau of public works, or under any other appropriate name, that bureau could be in communication with every city and town along the Ohio River. They could send their experts and make recommendations as to the appropriate location for the water terminal and plans for same of such type as would be adequate to the traffic needs of that city and town. They could consult with the local authorities respecting the construction and operation of boat lines, the interchange of traffic, and all of the other essentials necessary for a healthy water transportation.

All that Congress can do is to provide the improved channel in the harbor and in the interior river. At this time, so far as we can forecast the future, the providing of boat lines, the construction of terminals, the taking of steps for the interchange of traffic, the doing of all things that are essential for the full use of the improved channel must devolve upon the localities and cities, but local cooperation could be expedited and promoted by such a bureau in the Department of Commerce.

I hope at an early date to introduce a bill making it mandatory on the Interstate Commerce Commission to provide for an interchange of traffic, to enforce a system of prorating, and all the other things necessary for an interchange of traffic between boat lines and rail lines, such as now exist between the different rail lines of the country, and also create in the Department of Commerce some bureau which shall have jurisdiction of the things that are essential for the development of water transportation. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. HENRY A. CLARK,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 31, 1919,

Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the House Committee on Agriculture is composed of 21 members from 19 different States and the Delegate from Hawaii; Illinois has three representatives and each of the other States, included in which is Pennsylvania, has one. The closing lines of the bill read:

Total carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture	31,691,562

There are millions of people in the United States who have never seen this bill. A large percentage of farmers have not.

To some extent the headings and subdivisions and amounts assigned to each are here set forth for the purpose of showing how comprehensive the bill is and the funds considered necessary for the department.

The total amount provided in the bill may seem large or small, according to the way in which it is viewed. Regarded as dollars, it may seem large considered in the light of what we have expended in the last two years and the importance of agriculture to this country, and to other countries it may appear small.

Economy in consuming and in saving has been the cry that went throughout the land; plant, plant, and raise more food products has been the urgent request continually sounded in the farmers' ears for a year and a half.

The high cost of living has been the subject referred to in many addresses on the floor of the House, but usually without practical plans for reducing it.

The reasons which have caused increased cost of food are ascribed to the war, millions of men in the service constituting a consuming and not a creative force. This is undoubtedly one of the causes but not the only one. The war accentuated the importance of agriculture. Food for our men, our allies, and neutral nations demanded increased supplies.

There swept recently with great rapidity through Congress a bill under the cry of "bread or bullets," an appropriation of $100,000,000 to alleviate the alleged starving people of other countries, and soon food will be provided for those who a little while ago were our enemies. All this is due to war and may be of temporary duration. There are other causes which tend to make the high cost of living permanent. Two of them are farm help and increased cost of utensils and supplies. But that which appears to be a continuing cause is the urban drift of populations. The percentages of urban and rural population ascertained by census statistics show what this flocking to the cities is:

Urban percentage in 1880 was 29.5; rural, 70.5.
Urban percentage in 1890 was 36.1; rural, 63.9.
Urban percentage in 1900 was 40.5; rural, 59.5.
Urban percentage in 1910 was 46.3; rural, 53.7.

The entire population of the United States in 1910 was 91,972,266.

The rural population 49,348,883.
The urban population 42,623,383.

Places having less than 2,500 were included in the rural population. This means that large numbers were not actively engaged in farming. The next census will disclose the same tendency only in a more marked degree, as it appears to those who have given thought to the subject.

The cityward flow of population is greater in some States than in others. In Pennsylvania, for instance, in 1910 the urban percentage was 60.4 and the rural 39.6.

In this State the population of 7,665,111 was made up of 4,630,669 and country 3,034,442.

It is interesting at the present time to note the following data:

In the United States in 1910 the total number of farms were 6,361,502.

The land area of the country was 1,903,289,600.

The land area improved in farms was 475,451,750.

The average acreage per farm was 138.1.

The average improved acreage per farm was 75.2.

Per cent of total land area in farms, 46.2.

Per cent of land in farms improved, 54.4.

Per cent of total land area improved, 25.1.

Total value of farm property, $40,991,449,090.

Total value of farm land, $28,475,674,169.

Total value of farm buildings, $6,325,451,528.

Total value of farm implements and machinery, $1,265,149,783.

Total value of farm domestic animals, poultry, and bees, $1,265,149,783.

Average value of all property per farm, $6,444.

Average value of land per acre, $32.40.

The number of operators, all farms, 6,331,502.

Of these approximately one-half were tenants or not owners. The consuming population of the cities is growing more and more disproportionate to the food-producing force. The reasons are too well known to need comment—opportunity is one.

The country boy endowed with a rugged constitution, trained to frugal habits, ambitious to see and learn, seeks the city and makes good. The immigrant anxious to earn money finds wages in the city better and there locates. The average value of all farm property per farm being $6,444, a rapid increase of wealth can not be expected from an investment of that amount, and the city influx grows. In the past many notes of warning have been sounded. Luther Burbank said:

It is well at this time to look first to the fundamental sources of our food supply, and it is fortunate, perhaps, that we have at last been so rudely awakened to the rapidly growing disproportion between the production and consumption of food.

James J. Hill said that unless the drift from the farm to the cities were checked, hunger would follow.

What would happen if for one season only food producing in the United States should stop? The student of food-production conditions realizes the gravity of the situation and searches for the causes and endeavors to find relief; the great majority of the consuming public feel the conditions and merely voice a protest against the high cost of living without suggesting any practical remedies, and are convinced that the farmer is getting too much for his supplies.

A few illustrations will show that a great profit does not find its way into the farmers' pocketbook. As to the farmers' profits, I read from an article in one of the Washington papers. It will bear reading and reflection:

The price of wheat, fixed at $2.20 per bushel, makes the cost of a barrel of flour $11, as it requires 5 bushels of wheat to produce a barrel of flour. The difference in weight (wheat, 300 pounds; flour, 196 pounds) is 104 pounds of bran and middlings, which is at the present price ($40 per ton) ample to pay expenses of milling and sacking.

A barrel of flour will produce four hundred 11-ounce loaves of bread, such as is retailed in Washington for 10 cents a loaf, making a total of $40 a barrel for flour to the consumer.

This is a difference of $29 between the raw and finished product. Who is getting the difference? Not the farmer.

And, again, this may interest the southern grower of grapefruit. He puts from 60 to 64 in one crate, and if it nets him $3 a crate he is satisfied. In many hotels and on railroad trains one-half of a grapefruit sells for 25 cents; at that rate the crate would cost the consumer $32, leaving $29 difference between what the grower gets and the consumer pays. In a Government-conducted restaurant milk is now selling at the rate of 40 cents per quart; the farmer gets from 9 to 14 cents for a quart in sections; all of the profit has not reached the farmer. Two conditions may profitably be considered with reference to high prices—one the disproportionate growth of city populations, the other the extra cost to the consumer over and above what the producer receives.

Two things are necessary: First, a regulated agency—local, State, or National—through which food may go from the hand of the producer to the mouth of the consumer with as little expense as possible. These agencies may be of many different kinds. Second, raising more by increased efficiency in farming land now under cultivation and the cultivation of more land.

It might be fruitful of good results if the incoming immigrant were made to seek his home making in this country on the farm. The stability of the country rests in large measure upon those who till their own land. The importance of the farmer to the country has been of late abundantly recognized. Recently the bankers, in a meeting held at the Capital, discussed the helping of the tenant farmer to own his own land. The Canadian Government has made a liberal offer of land and money to her returning soldiers for the encouragement of agriculture and as a reward for services rendered. Secretary Lane has been working along similar lines for the benefit of our men—encouragement of farming and welfare of the whole country.

Interest in agriculture is rapidly growing. The following extract from the New York Herald illustrates this:

FARMERS ASK CONSIDERATION.

The Farmers' Union of the United States has just called the attention of the peace congress to the wisdom of fostering the industry on which we all depend—except a few ichthyophagy, of whom Sir Richard F. Burton tells us in his Travels in Arabia. The memorandum presented in Paris asks for the appointment of a special body having directly in charge the interests of agriculture, a question which is really more important than the boundaries of States or their political changes.

Recognizing the immense value of international cooperation, the document urges the extension and improvement of the Agricultural Institute at Rome, which was founded 15 years ago by David Lubin, who died last New Year's Day, and to whom the world owes a debt that is yet scarcely appreciated for his great work in bringing together 53 nations to promote the interests of the farmer. His crop reports and import and export statistics were considered the highest authority in their line.

Before the war international congresses were held under the auspices of the institute to study agricultural interests in all parts of the world. At the first of these, 40 nations were represented, and President Roosevelt appointed David Lubin as the American delegate, a position which he held until his death. It was partly through Mr. Lubin's efforts that the rural-credit system and the parcel post for farmers were introduced in this country.

The memorandum presented in Paris rightly urges the continuation of this highly useful institute, and suggests that a uniform system of crop estimating be adopted. Conservation of agriculture is another subject favored. Universal free education of farm children is advocated—extending the idea of the "little red schoolhouse" to the whole world. It advances the idea of the gradual abolition of farm tenancy, which has come down from feudal times and made such a large part of the populations of Europe mere serfs, working for the benefit of their landlords. The peace congress would do well to heed the farmers' plea.

Billions of our dollars have been appropriated for war purposes; in comparison the amount carried in this bill is small and to a department whose activities are directed for the benefit of agriculture, without which neither the industrial armies of peace nor the militant armies of war could endure.

What Congress Has Done for the Discharged and the Disabled Soldier and Sailor.

OF

HON. WILLIAM B. OLIVER,

OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, it is important for every person who served in the Army or Navy during the great war to know what Congress has done for the protection of his interests. It has been the aim of Congress to provide every possible means to take care of the disabled and the discharged soldiers, to the end that they may return to civil life with their rights fully protected and with an enlarged opportunity of employment.

The Sixty-fifth Congress was a war Congress. It had to provide a great war organization and had to meet and solve tremendous military and financial problems. No other Congress in our history has had to face such tasks. Many other things remain to be done. The sudden termination of the war brought us face to face with the problem of demobilization before we had completely gotten into the war. The short time left to the Sixty-fifth Congress was not sufficient to allow for the enactment of all bills relating to the return of our soldiers. These must go over to the next Congress.

The following provisions enacted by the Sixty-fifth Congress should be brought to the attention of every discharged or wounded soldier:

1. The soldiers' and sailors' civil rights act, which provides that no advantage can be taken of the absence of a soldier or sailor on duty to gain a judgment by default in a court of law; it also protects his rights in the matter of installment payments on insurance, land, or other property. (H. R. 6361.)

2. Laws passed protecting the homestead entries of absent soldiers and sailors by extending the time for payment and otherwise protecting the title. (H. R. 4617 and H. R. 13353.)

3. The newly enacted Post Office appropriation bill, carrying an appropriation of $200,000,000 for the construction of Government roads to be apportioned among the several States. Its purpose is to furnish employment to discharged soldiers and sailors on a very interesting and very important public work. The building of these roads will require the services of a large number of skilled experts of different kinds as well as laborers. It will not be done by the Army nor under Army jurisdiction nor at the Army rate of pay. The builders of these highways will be paid according to civilian standards. Preference will be given to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors in employment for this work.

4. Under the war-risk insurance act soldiers and sailors returning to civil life may, after a certain length of time, convert their war insurance into one of several forms of policies offered by the War Risk Insurance Bureau. This matter should be taken up by correspondence with the bureau, which will readily furnish complete information on the subject.

5. Section 1406 of the last revenue act, approved February 24, 1919, authorizes the payment of a bonus of $60 to officers, soldiers, field clerks, and nurses of the Army upon honorable separation from the service. Those who have been discharged and have received their final pay without the bonus should write a letter to the "zone finance officer, Lemon Building, Washington, D. C.," stating their service since April 6, 1917, the date of last discharge, and their present address. They should inclose with this letter their discharge certificate or military order for discharge, or both, if both were issued. The discharge certificate will be returned to the soldier with the check for $60. The original certificate or order must be sent, not a copy.

6. Near the close of the last session Congress passed an act allowing every discharged soldier to retain permanently one complete uniform, including the overcoat and other articles of personal apparel belonging to the uniform. If a soldier has already been discharged and has turned in his uniform, he is entitled to have another one like the one he turned in. In such a case he should write to the office of the Quartermaster General or the nearest branch of the same. (H. R. 13366.)

7. The hospital and sanatorium act recently passed appropriated $10,000,000 for the building and equipment of hospitals and sanatoriums on Government-owned land in various parts of the country for the care and treatment of discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, marines, and Army and Navy nurses. The Secretary of the Treasury, as head of the Public Health Service, is authorized to proceed with this work immediately. (H. R. 13026.)

8. One of the most important laws passed by the Sixty-fifth Congress is the vocational rehabilitation act. This law provides for the training of disabled soldiers and sailors for occupations after they are discharged from the hospitals, and creates the Federal Board for Vocational Education to carry out the terms of the act.

Until his discharge from hospital care, the medical and surgical treatment necessary to restore him to health and strength is under the jurisdiction of the military and naval authorities. The vocational training which may afterwards be necessary to restore him to self-supporting activity is under the jurisdiction of the Federal Board for Vocational Education. If he needs an artificial limb or other appliance the Bureau of War Risk Insurance supplies it free upon his discharge and renews it when necessary. If after his discharge he again needs medical treatment on account of his disability the Bureau of War Risk Insurance supplies it free. Any man whose disability entitles him to compensation under the war risk insurance act may be provided by the Federal Board for Vocational Education with a course of training for a new occupation. The board considers itself responsible for getting his old job back or fitting him for a new one.

While he is taking this training he is supported by the Government. But this compensation is not the same thing as insurance. It is something distinct from that and is given whether the soldier is insured or not. It is given for partial as well as total disability. If further information is desired on this point, address a letter to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, Washington, D. C., and ask them to send you Official Bulletin No. 2, "What the United States Government does for its fighting men and their families."

To get this compensation, application must be made for it. Blanks will be furnished by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. Application should be made before or soon after leaving the hospital. Members of the hospital educational staff in every hospital will be glad to give full information on these points. In general this compensation is not less than $65 a month for a man without dependents. If he has dependents allowances are paid to them. As President Wilson has said, "This is not a charity. It is merely the payment of a draft of honor which the United States of America accepted when it selected these men and took them in their health and strength to fight the battles of the Nation."

Under the training and guidance of the Federal Board for Vocational Education in nearly every case the disabled man can either rid himself of his handicap caused by his disability or acquire new powers to replace any that may have been lost. The board will also keep in touch with the man after he receives permanent employement, so long as may be necessary for his full reestablishment as a worker.

The board has published a series of "Opportunity Monographs" which they will gladly send to anyone interested. These cover a number of occupations in relation to the problem faced by the disabled soldier. The following are some of the titles already available for distribution:

Army Occupations as Preparation for Civilian Employment.
Safety and Fire Protection Engineering.
The Metal Trades.
Factory Woodworking Trades.
Oxy-Acetylene Welding.
Forestry Pursuits. Foresters, Rangers, Forest Guards.
Automobile Maintenance and Service.
Employment Management. A New Executive Position in Industry.
Concrete Construction and Cement Manufacture.
Electrical Employments with Utility Companies.
Electrical Construction, Maintenance, and Repair Occupations.
The Law as a Vocation.
The Practice of Medicine as a Vocation.
Journalism as a Vocation.
The Lumber Industry.
Occupations in the Automobile Manufacturing Industry.

All disabled soldiers, whether in or out of the hospital, or their families or dependents, should address their inquiries about their specific cases either to the Federal Board for Vocational Education, Washington, D. C., or to the district office of the board of the district in which they are located. The district for Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi is district No. 6, with its office at 822 Maison Blanche Annex, New Orleans, La.

9. A measure of great importance to the discharged soldier and to the country—the national soldier settlement bill (H. R. 15993)—passed the House, but was unfortunately caught in the legislative jam in the Senate at the close of last session. This bill has been advocated very strongly by Secretary Lane and its enactment was urged by President Wilson. The purpose of the bill is to furnish employment and homes to a large number of men discharged from the armed forces by engaging them upon a great reclamation project. There are more than 200,000,000 acres of arid, swamp, and cut-over forest lands in the United States which can be converted into farms by irrigation, drainage, or clearing. It is said that there are over 40,000,000 acres of these lands in the South between Washington, D. C., and New Orleans. In Alabama alone there are 14,785,000 acres of cut-over or logged-off timberland and 1,479,200 acres of swamp land, making a total of 16,264,000 acres that can be converted into farms.

Now, this bill provides a fund of $100,000,000 to finance these projects. It is to be done as a part of the regular reclamation service of the Government, and a great opportunity for employment of both skilled and unskilled men will be furnished to our returning soldiers and sailors. When the land is made fit for cultivation it is to be sold to these men for homes and farms on easy terms by the Government. The interest on the deferred payments will be only 4½ per cent per annum. The law, when enacted, will be administered by the Secretary of the Interior through the Reclamation Service. The bill is practically certain to pass soon after Congress meets again. Full information concerning this bill can be had by writing to the United States Reclamation Service, Department of the Interior, Washington, D. C. Of special interest is their bulletin Work and Homes for our Fighting Men, which can be had upon application.

10. Another bill of interest to soldiers and sailors was pending when Congress adjourned on March 4 last. It gave preference to them in employment in the civil service of the Government. This bill (H. R. 15145) had been considered by the committee of the House and was reported to the House for favorable action. Its passage would give to honorably discharged soldiers and sailors a preferred standing with reference to Government employment. Other things being equal, they would be chosen in preference to those who had not served in the Army or Navy.

It is hoped that these facts will be helpful to our returned fighting men and to their families. Congress has done what it could within the short time it has had to consider the problem of the demobilization of our tremendous armed forces. It is recognized that there have been delays both in Congress and in the departments, but these have been due to the magnitude of the problems involved and also to the fact that the whole thing was new and without precedent. The War Department has had to build up the largest and most complicated organization in the world. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance is also entirely new and has just completed the full organization of its forces. Payment to many of the soldiers has been delayed, and complaints of this character have been filed with the office, and in many cases we have been able to secure early adjustment. The same is true in reference to allotments and allowances. In cases of this kind letters should be promptly written to the Congressmen, calling attention to it, and they will be glad to assist in straightening such matters out.

HON. ROYAL C. JOHNSON,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. On February 18, as an amendment to the military bill, I offered the following amendment, to which a point of order was made by the chairman:

Add a new paragraph, as follows:

"From and after the passage of this act the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized to promote all officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men who have been recommended for promotion for service of a special meritorious character, which recommendations have been approved by competent military authority, to the grade and rank to which they were respectively recommended. That in the event any such officer or enlisted man has been honorably separated from the service he shall be commissioned in the reserve, with the grade and rank to which he was recommended for promotion, or if he shall not desire a commission in the reserve he shall receive a commission in the rank to which he was recommended.

"Each officer or enlisted man so commissioned shall receive pay in the increased rank from the day of recommendation to the day of discharge. The commission so issued to officers and enlisted men after the date of honorable separation from the service shall not be in force or effect after the date of such separation and shall contain a provision to that effect."

In my opinion, the next Congress should enact into substantive law this amendment in order to do justice to the men who actually saw service at the front and were recommended for promotion. It will take in not only officers but many enlisted men, who were sent to officers' finishing schools in France and ought to get credit for their work. If they were entitled to promotion at all, they should receive it from the day the recommendation was made, so that they may be paid from that day.

I am convinced that an injustice was done many of these men when they were not commissioned and not promoted, and the only way that we can deal out justice to them is to have the increased rank commence from the day when the unfair order of November 11 was issued.

At the next session of Congress I shall introduce this as a special measure and fight for its enactment into law.

OF
HON. NORMAN J. GOULD,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919,

On the foreign trade section of the bond bill with respect to the situation in Mexico.

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Speaker, a quietly dressed individual walked into a bank in Mexico City recently and introduced himself to the cashier, a Hollander:

"I am an American," he said "representing an American firm."

"That," replied the cashier, warningly, "is a combination of misfortunes that you will do well to conceal while in Mexico."

Whether the Dutch banker had heard of the similar bon mot by the late Speaker Reed, or whether the story is true at all, it serves to illustrate, like a two-edged blade, the sad state of our national prestige with our southern and disorderly neighbor.

In his once-famous Mobile address, President Wilson referred to our Mexican neighbors as "a race of dignity, self-control, and great achievement." That statement is just as true, just as applicable, and just as well-balanced as any policy or move for which the American Government has since been responsible.

As a result, among this "race of dignity, self-control, and great achievement" the title "American" has become a byword and a laughingstock; the American citizen, deserted by his own Government, has been persecuted and hounded until, were he a weaker type, less filled with the pride of race, he must, perforce, blush to confess his nationality.

This race of "self-control" under the fatuous, socialistic indulgence of our Government, since 1912 has not been too restrained to shoot down defenseless strangers in their midst who admitted the once magic title "American"; nor too dignified to receive with the left hand our offerings of charity and good will, and with the right hand shoot down unwarned the bearer of these offerings; nor in its "great achievements" has it been too sensitive of its honor to violate all the rules and ethics of international morality and common decency.

An all-embracing issue before the country now—as it will remain before the country until settled by the elections of 1920—is the issue Americanism against Bolshevism. This issue extends to our foreign relations; it has already affected our trade with Latin America to such an extent that only a strong, even policy of resistance on justice and respect for international obligations on the part of our southern neighbors ever can hope to build again from the present wreckage the lofty structure of mutual trust and confidence conceived, founded, and completed under the leadership of such men as Theodore Roosevelt and Elihu Root.

At the last session of Congress I introduced two resolutions, both of which were referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House:

Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to furnish the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives all facts and consular and other official reports: First, in relation to the degree of protection afforded by the present Government of Mexico to American lives and property in the Republic of Mexico, particularly in oil-producing districts; second, in relation to the conduct of the troops of the Government of Mexico in giving or failure to give protection to American citizens and property; and third, in relation to the reported attempt of the Government of Mexico to confiscate lands legally acquired by American citizens, firms, or corporations in Mexico.

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives be, and the same hereby is, authorized and directed to inquire into the causes and conditions attendant on and resulting from the failure of the Government of the United States to extend formal recognition to the existing Government of the Republic of Costa Rica, and to report to the House of Representatives the facts involved.

It is my purpose at the next Congress to urge the passage of these or similar resolutions looking to a thorough and intelligent investigation of our Latin-American relations. I have every reason to believe that such steps will then be taken as will force the Department of State to call a halt on our present un-American and unmanly foreign policies and restore our flag to its former place in the hearts and minds of the peoples of the Latin Americas.

It is my purpose here to discuss only broadly the Mexican situation in its entirety and to deal particularly with the oil-producing district of the State of Vera Cruz and the oil-shipping district of Tampico, where American and British interests alone have investments aggregating $300,000,000 and where so-called bandit outrages in the past 17 months alone have cost the lives of 9 Americans and the wounding of 11 Americans and a loss through stolen goods and money alone of more than $170,000.

And I say, and I will prove, that the situation in this particular section is one of Government-protected outlawry, aimed largely against American citizens, and in which the Government of the United States by its inactivity has tacitly acquiesced.

I am presenting in tabulated form a partial list of murders, assaults, robberies, and "requisitions" by Carranza troops upon American citizens and properties in the Tampico oil fields alone. This tabulation shows that between August 15, 1917, and February 5, 1919, not less than 114 of these outrages occurred—one in every four and one-half days for the entire period—costing the lives of 9 American citizens and 3 Mexican employees and the wounding of 11 American citizens and 5 other employees.

In only 64 of the cases listed do my reports give an estimate of the money loss and in no case is an estimate included of damage done the properties through destruction of wells, pipe lines, railway bridges, and buildings. And yet this total representing only the proceeds of highway robbery for that period, reaches the staggering figure of $171,610.66.

During this entire period our Government maintained diplomatic relations with the "Government" of Mexico, the principal income of which is derived from heavy taxation of these same properties. During this entire period our ambassador to Mexico, when not in this country vainly arguing with American bankers on behalf of further loans to the Mexican "Government," was in Mexico City watching the machinations of the German embassy, upon which First Chief Carranza leaned heavily for advice, as it encouraged him in measures designed to cripple the oil supply for the American and British Navies.

It is a significant fact that between October 6, 1917—the United States entered the war in April, 1917—and October 16, 1918, not less than 21 of these outrages were proven against Carranza forces, either in the form of "requisitions" for money and supplies, for which no reimbursement was offered or made; plain highway robbery by Carranza soldiers in their individual capacity; or demands by Carranza officials for money in return for "protection," which was never given, and which resulted in the deliberate destruction of foreign properties by Carranza officers when such payments were not forthcoming.

The following tabulation gives a comprehensive view of the situation in the oil fields alone between August 15, 1917, and February 5, 1919:

I am in a position to furnish detailed information as to each of the outrages listed in this tabulation. In the interest of economy, however, I shall confine myself to a few striking examples of murderous assaults by alleged bandits upon American citizens and property and of the method and measure of protection which "our friend" the Carranza government offers our citizens.

On December 27, 1917, Paymaster A. E. Schmidt, of the Aguila Co., on board the launch Vasuto, was held up and robbed of $40,710.66 at kilometers 8–9 of the Chijol Canal, five miles from the city of Tampico. The launch was fired on without warning and the engineer, Manuel Viano, was wounded, although no attempt was made to get away nor was any resistance made.

On February 12, 1917, Paymaster House, of the Texas Co., in the launch Alex I, was held up by bandits on the Chijol Canal within a few miles of Tampico. The launch was fired upon without warning and the Mexican launch boy was shot through both arms. Mr. House opened fire with a shotgun after bringing the launch to and disbursed the bandits.

February 19 and February 21, 1917, the launches Thendara and Roup-La, belonging to the Cia. Metropolitan de Oleaductos S. A., and carrying three American passengers, were riddled with bullets fired by armed bandits. The pilot of the launch was severely wounded, and one of the American passengers was slightly wounded. While these two launches were being fired on on the 21st the following incident was transpiring. I quote from a report of the Mexican manager of the Texas Co.:

Early in the morning of February 21 launch Alex I was stopped by bandits in Chijol Canal near Tampico. The bandits were looking for the paymaster and the pay roll, but, as other arrangements had been made at the last moment, he was not aboard. The bandits threatened to kill a passenger who was on board, believing him to be the paymaster, but a company employee, Mr. C. C. Sidwell, finally convinced them that the passenger was not Mr. House. One of the launch boys was shot through the arm when the launch was fired into by the bandits from the shore to stop it. Mr. Sidwell, the passenger, and the launch boys were robbed of all their personal belongings by the bandits. Just as the bandits were finishing the robbing of persons on board the Alex I the two fast launches of the Metropolitan (Island Oil Co.) came by the spot. They were both fired into, but the Thendara kept going, on account of her great speed, and got away, one man, Mr. Walter Prather, being slightly wounded. The other launch was stopped because the man at the wheel was wounded. On board this launch was Paymaster Minnet, Dr. Brisbane, and several other employees of the Island Oil Co., and Paymaster House, of the Texas Co. The bandits knew exactly how much money the Island paymaster should have and were satisfied after that had been passed out to them. They apparently did not know that Paymaster House was on board the same boat, but they chanced to see the end of his shotgun and demanded that same be turned over to them. On account of his previous experience, Paymaster House was afraid to surrender the gun and prepared to defend himself. He was killed in the fusilade which followed. Paymaster Minnet was wounded in three places; Dr. Brisbane was seriously wounded. There were about 40 men in the party, all well armed. Total casualties: Mr. House, killed; Mr. Minnet, Dr. Brisbane, and Mr. Prather wounded; Mexican launch boy wounded. All the wounded men recovered. About 14,000 pesos were taken by the bandits. None of these were caught or punished.

These are only a few of the many instances in which pay launches on the way from Tampico to the various fields by this canal were held up and robbed by armed men posing as bandits.

Now, here is a startling coincidence and an equally startling commentary upon the measure of protection which our Government has been able to obtain from the "friendly" government of Mexico.

By decree of the Carranza government in the last outrage listed above, which cost the life of one American, the severe wounding of two others, the Texas Co. had registered with Carranza authorities in Tampico the amount of money, the date of sending, and the name of the launch. This explains the intimate knowledge which the "bandits" had not only of the movements of this pay launch but of the other pay launches as well, and the actions of Carranza officials in Tampico, and the unusual amount of money they had the day following this outrage indicates that this was no coincidence at all, but a plain murderous outrage and robbery perpetrated by Carranza soldiers directed by high Carranza officials in Tampico.

American consul at Tampico, I understand, has reported his belief that Carranza soldiers perpetrated this outrage.

Now, here is another case. On June 29, 1918, a party of five armed Mexicans, believed to be Carranza soldiers acting with or without orders, entered the Prieto terminal of the Mexican Gulf Oil Co., about four miles from Tampico. Within 30 to 40 minutes they had killed four Americans and one native foreman, wounded another native employee, and escaped with $5,562.40 United States currency. No resistance was made by any of the men at the terminal, and no cause was apparent for the brutal assault and death of these men.

On August 21, 1918, nothing apparently having been done by the Carranza government toward the apprehension of these murderers, I wrote the Secretary of State for information in the premises. Under date of August 29, 1918, Secretary Lansing replied that the Department of State had been apprised of the incident by the American consul at Tampico on the day of its occurrence. Mr. Secretary Lansing's letter concludes:

> * * * The consul added that he had requested the authorities to apprehend the murderers, and it appears from his reports that he has renewed that request on several occasions. Similar requests have been made under instructions from the department by the American Embassy at Mexico City upon the Mexican foreign office, and the last advices received by the department from the embassy are to the effect that the foreign office states that two men suspected of complicity of the crime have been placed under arrest at Jopoy.

I have since, within the last few days, talked with the office of the Secretary, and have been informed that that office has no further information, though "on several occasions" the State Department prior to August 29, 1918, through the American consul at Tampico, had renewed that "request" that the murderers be apprehended and punished.

"Request"—can you imagine any self-respecting American community "requesting" its police authorities to apprehend and punish the murderers of four of its members, or sitting back placidly for eight months while those same authorities did nothing?

Or can you conceive of the Government of a self-respecting, law-abiding people going no further than to "request" that murderers of its nationals on foreign soil be punished?

How does that "request" compare with the ringing ultimatum of Theodore Roosevelt in 1904 to the Sultan of Morocco, one of whose bandit chiefs, Rasuli, was holding an American citizen for ransom—"Perdicaris alive or Rasuli dead"?

And how do the results attained by these widely different methods of diplomacy compare? Perdicaris was promptly delivered to his friends alive and well; the State Department within a week has informed me that nothing further has been heard or done in the matter of the outrages and murders of June 29, 1918, which cost the lives of four American citizens.

Less than a month later—July 24, 1918—a Porto Rican pipeline foreman, an American citizen, was murdered and the pipeline superintendent, an American citizen, of the Cortez Oil Co., was stabbed near Port Lobos, in Carranza territory.

Five days later—July 31, 1918—A. W. Stevenson, an American citizen, cashier of the Texas Co., was shot in the back and killed by armed Mexicans while he stooped to open a safe to comply with their demands for money.

On December 17, 1918, J. M. Franklin and W. H. Rose, American citizens and employees of an American oil concern, disappeared on Lake Tamaihua, on the main traveled channel between Tampico and the oil fields, in Carranza territory. On January 20 the bodies of these two men, who had been shot with rifle bullets, were found on Cabo Rojo Island in the lake.

July 30, 1917, in extending de jure recognition to the "government" of First Chief Carranza, President Wilson addressed him in a personal letter as "Great and good friend."

And now let us consider the degree of "protection" which this great and good friend, which we had honored by our recognition and by the assigning of an ambassador, has afforded our nationals.

On August 2, 1918, Mr. Rox Underwood, accompanied by a military escort of sixteen Government soldiers, left the Fiscal Wharf at Tampico in a motor launch with pay-roll money amounting to 5,893 pesos en route for southern oil-field camps. At the southern end of the Chijol Canal the "military escort" disembarked and withdrew. Less than 2 miles farther down the launch was fired on and the pilot immediately turned the launch to the bank, were five men came aboard. In the face of nonresistance the leader of these men fired on Mr. Underwood, and missing him still proclaimed that Underwood was condemned to death and must be shot. He was finally dissuaded from this purpose, however, and taking the money permitted the launch to proceed. These men were armed with Mauser rifles and dressed in practically the same manner as government troops. Two of them were recognized by the crew of the launch as part of a military escort which had accompanied them on a previous trip and who belonged to the command of Col. Fermin M. Acosta, in charge of the government garrison at San Geronimo. This same garrison about this time had "requisitioned" nearly $500 worth of camp material and provisions from the barges of this company tied up at San Geronimo.

That's "governmental protection" a la Mexico.

The day before a pay boat of the Gulf Refining Co. had received even a more marked degree of "protection" from its Carranza guard, which disembarked and withdrew at Rivera, and then held up and robbed the boat a mile south of that point.

Here is still another example of protection, along somewhat different lines:

On August 4, 1918, a detachment of Government troops was sent from Tuxpam to protect a plant of the Aguila Co. from incendiary fires supposedly started by bandits. The Aguila Co. provisioned these troops for four days, at the end of which no further provisions were available. Their leader, Capt. Vidrios, upon learning of the situation remarked significantly "esta bueno" (it is good) and immediately marched his command off into the brush. A few minutes later 15 brush fires, in extended formation, sprang up from the vicinity where the government troops had last been observed, these fires being so located as to threaten the entire plant with destruction. By heroic effort the employees of the company managed to neutralize the flames, though not until an entire sea line had been burst from the heat and a large quantity of oil lost.

On August 25, 1918, employees of the Cortez Oil Co. captured two robbers in front of their plant. They turned these men over to the local commandante, together with witnesses, stolen goods, and other evidence. Gen. Lopez de Lara visited the camp the following day and released the prisoners forthwith.

The effect of the proposed constitution of the league of nations upon our interests in and responsibility for Mexico is of impressive importance.

Under the Monroe doctrine, and under guaranties made to European Governments by our State Department, the responsibility of the United States involves the protection of all foreign investments in Mexico, valued at $1,641,054,180, divided according to an official report of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce, as follows:

American	$1,057,770,000
English	321,302,800
French	143,446,000
Various	118,535,380

Of this amount $300,000,000, according to the same authority, is invested in oil fields, of which $200,000,000 is American capital. The remainder of the total of foreign investments in Mexico is in railroads, mines, bonds, bank deposits, and agricultural lands.

In addition to this responsibility the State Department, in the interest of the Mexican Government to prevent retaliatory measures by European powers, has assumed official financial responsibility for all damage claims growing out of political disorders and outrages in Mexico in the last eight years, totaling, with American claims, about $500,000,000, according to the best information I can get.

Now, let us see what would be the probable effect of the adoption of the proposed constitution of the league of nations upon our concern with conditions in Mexico.

The terms of the constitution of the proposed league are so vague and their effect so uncertain that one is left largely to the realm of conjecture respecting the working of such a league; and the best way to get a clear conception of what the league might do, and to a practical certainty will do, if adopted, is to apply its terms to a concrete case.

President Wilson has said that the Monroe doctrine under this constitution would be extended to the entire world. That means, if it means anything, that the Monroe doctrine, in so far as it has anything of interest to the United States, or to the Western Hemisphere, would be lost entirely. The Monroe doctrine is purely a Western Hemisphere policy; robbed of its geographic distinction it becomes a dead letter. And to this the United States, if we subscribed to the proposed constitution of the league of nations, will have assented.

Several years ago our Government and our people were greatly disturbed because rumor had it that Japan was securing a concession and establishing a naval base at Magdalena Bay. Inquiry disclosed that citizens of Japan and not the Government of Japan were securing an important concession at Magdalena Bay, which they claimed was for business purposes. Any observer, however, was fully aware that behind this cloak of business enterprise was concealed a far-reaching military strategic plan of Japan. The imminence and seriousness of the matter was so great that Senator LODGE introduced and the Senate passed, by a vote of 51 to 4, the famous resolution which read as follows:

> Resolved, That when any harbor or other place in the American Continent is so situated that the occupation thereof for naval or military purposes might threaten the communications or the safety of the United States, the Government of the United States could not see without grave concern the possession of such harbor or other place by any corporation or association which has such a relation to another government, not American, as to give that government practical power or of control for national purposes.

What has so recently occurred may conceivably occur again—is almost certain to occur again. Supposing individual citizens of Japan should secure from Mexico a concession on Magdalena Bay, which everyone with a grain of sense knows would be to enable Japan to secure a naval base from which she could operate against the United States, what could the United States do in the league of nations? Manifestly she would be powerless. Let it be understood that it is not the Japanese Government that is making a move. They are citizens of Japan. There is no aggression against the Mexican Government because the Mexican Government is a party to it. The Monroe doctrine has been abolished, and, under the terms of the league, the league could do nothing but sit around and talk about it. In the meantime Japan would proceed to establish as important a naval base as she desired at Magdalena Bay.

The passage of the above resolution was an expression of the determination of the United States to protect herself. It was an act of self-preservation backed not by law, backed not by international law, backed only by the physical power and the determination of the United States to protect herself. Should she become a member of the proposed league, under the terms of the constitution proposed for that league, her hands would be tied, even in grave cases of this character.

Mexico, not having entered the league, would be no more bound by its lofty ideals and unselfish motives than it has been in the past.

Article 27 of the "new" Mexican constitution, adopted in 1917, expressly forbids any except Mexican companies to acquire directly, or to operate directly, petroleum lands in Mexico. The petroleum lands now owned and operated by Americans, which would be confiscated under decrees issued by the Mexican Government, based on article 27, are not "concessions" in any sense of the word.

The official report of the Department of Commerce above referred to says on this point:

> The most interesting point about the American companies is that, apparently, not one of them has ever obtained a "concession" of land from the Mexican Government. Their contracts of purchase or lease, it is stated, have in every case been made with private owners, who held titles extending back often for more than 250 years.

The position of this Government in the premises was clearly set forth in a note delivered by Ambassador Fletcher to the Carranza government in Mexico on April 2, 1918, declaring:

> The United States can not acquiesce in any procedure ostensibly or nominally in the form of taxation or the exercise of eminent domain, but really resulting in confiscation of private property and arbitrary deprivation of vested rights.

This position would be entirely vitiated by the "extension" of the Monroe doctrine to "the entire world" through the league of nations, and under the proposed constitution of the league Mexico might to be able to place herself in a position of entire immunity from just retaliation for her repudiation of all the principles and tenets of international honor.

The nations that might lodge protest against this confiscation would have their action marked out by article 17 of the league's constitution—an invitation to Mexico to become a member of the league on equal terms for the purposes of the dispute. Parties to the dispute under article 12 would then have an undetermined or "reasonable" length of time for the presentation of their arguments to the executive council of the league. The council would have six months within which to make "recommendations," from which Mexico at any time within three months thereafter may appeal to the league as a whole. More than double the time already consumed might be expected to elapse before any tangible result could be looked for from such an appeal.

In the event that the award finally went against Mexico, the executive council under article 13 could then vaguely propose "what steps can best be taken to give effect thereto" if Mexico should decline to abide by such decision. And although such action on the part of Mexico might be treated as an act of war the penalty affixed would be not war, but severance of trade relations, prohibition of all intercourse with league States—boycott and isolation.

And the effect of such isolation? Why simply this, that Mexico with her stolen oil fields and other foreign properties could trade freely with any nonmember of the league—Germany, for instance—and everybody except members of the league of nations would be happy and prosperous therefrom.

Or if Mexico should accept the award after a lapse of probably more than a year, millions of barrels of oil and other products would have been taken from these properties of American, British, and French owners and disposed of. The value of two years' production of Mexican oil alone is more than $50,000,000. Mexico is now unable to pay even interest on her bonds. How could she be forced to pay this larger sum to compensate the American, British, and French owners after they had been successful in the litigation?

But suppose Mexico decides not to become a member of the league of nations or, which is more probable for one reason or another, self-respecting nations, members of the league, decline to accept, as they properly should, an outlawed and morally bankrupt nation on terms of equality. The United States, being a member of the league along with Great Britain and France, would have abrogated its right, until now internationally conceded, to special influence and consideration in dealing with the affairs of the Western Hemisphere. Great Britain has $321,302,800 tied up in Mexican investments, more than half of which involve oil properties which the Mexican Government now is seeking to confiscate. In addition, she is largely interested in the $500,000,000 budget of damage claims against the Mexican Government. France is similarly concerned, as are Holland and Italy. And while the combined financial interests of these Governments in Mexico are less than one-half as great as the interest of the United States, their voting strength in the league of nations under the proposed constitution, in dealing with this question, would be in the ratio of 4 to 1 when compared with ours, for the natural desire of Japan previously demonstrated, to encourage any invasion of our superior rights in this hemisphere, must be considered as a probable factor against us.

Suppose, then, that Great Britain, assured of the moral support of France, Italy, and Japan, should start coercive measures against Mexico in an effort, real or ostensible, to force a settlement of her claims.

Mexico not being a member of the league, nor acceptable as such by the powers thus arrayed against her, what would be the situation of the United States? Where, then, would be that plausible "extension of the Monroe doctrine to the entire world"? What would prevent the blockade by Great Britain of Mexican ports and the seizure by the same power of her customhouses?

In view of the half-bandit, half-Bolshevik Government which we have suffered to drag Mexico to ruin and collapse since 1910, in view of the financial bankruptcy and political chaos from which this Mexican Government has proven itself utterly incapable of emerging, might not Great Britain find plausible arguments which would justify her, in the view of her sisters in interest—France, Italy, and Japan—in retaining control of the finances and commerce, and through them the very domestic affairs of Mexico for an indefinite term of years on the pretext of collecting damages due and for the protection of the interests of her nationals?

And, Woodrow Wilson to the contrary notwithstanding, honest men the world over do not quarrel with that Government which protects its nationals abroad.

There you have in all its baldness an application of the "extension of the Monroe doctrine to the entire world."

Could any political camouflage be more pernicious in its subversion of our national interests?

Could any proposal be more un-American?

Can you imagine a Washington, a Lincoln, a Cleveland, or a Roosevelt suggesting such a policy?

The last words of the last message of Theodore Roosevelt to the American people, printed after his death, will never be forgotten, I hope, when the league of nations or the Mexican situation is under discussion:

> We have enough to do that is our business. Mexico is our Balkan Peninsula, and during the last five years, thanks largely to Mr. Wilson's able assistance, it has been reduced to a condition as hideous as that of the Balkan Peninsula under Turkish rule. We are in honor bound to remedy this wrong and to keep ourselves so prepared that the Monroe doctrine, especially as regards the lands in any way controlling the approach to the Panama Canal, shall be accepted as immutable international law.

While the United States and her associates—France, Italy, and Great Britain—were in the throes of a death struggle with Germany, was this "friendly" government of First Chief Carranza, to which we had recently accredited an ambassador as a mark of our especial favor and confidence, was this Government aiding us in the saving of civilization from the worst catastrophe the world has ever been called upon to face?

Most emphatically she was not; on the contrary, she was not even decently neutral. She was helping the Hun; daily her "first chief" basked in the false sunshine of German influence; sought counsel from German Minister Von Eckardt, to whose sinister intrigues was assigned the consummation of the plan exposed in the Zimmermann correspondence—to effect a Mexican-German-Japanese alliance for the invasion of the United States from Mexican soil.

What beautifully polished, carefully phrased denial from such a source will ever convince thinking men and women that First Chief Carranza was ignorant of the plan which Von Eckardt's foreign office had instructed him to "put over" immediately after the expected declaration of war on Germany by the United States? Who will believe that Carranza had not discussed, considered, and tacitly accepted this plan until publication of the Zimmermann correspondence robbed it of its secrecy and hope of success?

Who will doubt, if he can draw intelligent conclusions from cold, unpleasant facts, that the outrages, political interferences, and administrative persecutions, under which American and British oil producers were laboring, were conceived by Von Eckardt and suggested to Carranza as a means of impeding and ultimately, through the operation of article 27 of the new Mexican constitution, cutting off entirely the supply of fuel oil upon which American and British Navies and merchant ships were depending to win the war?

The United States entered the war on April 6, 1917. It had been apparent for months that she could not long postpone such action. On May 1, 1917, the new Mexican constitution was made operative by decree of Carranza. I have already referred to article 27 of that remarkable document.

At the risk of being considered tedious, and because I desire to deal as comprehensively as is practicable at the present time with this particular phase of the Mexican situation, I shall quote at some length from the report on "The Mexican oil situation," issued in mimeograph form to the press under date of October 7, 1918, by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce. This is a really remarkable document, because in its fairness and single-minded justice to persecuted American interests in Mexico it is so repugnant to the oft-enunciated Mexican policy of the State Department as to suggest the thought that some one must have risked his official "place in the sun" to write and issue it. I quote from this report:

THE MEXICAN OIL SITUATION.

Our Navy, our merchant marine, our Army, and the various industries which are so essential to the prosecution of the war all demand oil, and Mexico is an important source of oil supply. It is with particular concern, therefore, that the American people are watching for any development in regard to the status of oil properties in that country.

OIL LEGISLATION IN MEXICO.

A report issued August 25, 1918, by the executive department of the Mexican Government (informe con justificacion que rinde el ejecutive de la union, etc.), states the present attitude of Mexico very plainly. How far this will be modified, as a result of the pending suits contesting the validity of the recent Mexican decrees of February 19, July 31, and August 12, 1918, remains to be seen. This report of August 25 is really a brief for the defense in reply to the demand, made in due form by the petroleum companies through the Mexican courts, for a writ of "amparo," a special form of relief from the decrees of February 19, July 31, and August 12, which require "manifests" to be filed by oil companies, and impose certain "rentals" and "royalties." Vested rights are particularly threatened in article 27 of the new Mexican constitution of 1917, which expressly forbids any but Mexican companies to acquire directly or operate directly petroleum lands in Mexico.

On pages 7 and 8 of the August 25 report it is claimed that article 27 of the new constitution is merely a resumption of the ancient right of "eminent domain," which, it is maintained, gives to Mexico perpetually the "direct ownership" of the subsoil. Consequently any past Mexican legislation or contracts consummated according to such legislation, which made oil deposits the property of individuals, would have to be considered null and void. In other words, it is idle (p. 22) "to hold against the State the existence of contracts * * * anterior to the constitution." "Nor is there reason in this case (p. 20) for an indemnity."

Article 14, however, of the new constitution declares that "no law shall be given retroactive effect to the prejudice of any person." That petroleum properties were legally recognized in 1884, 1892, and 1909 is a mere matter of Mexican legislative history, however it may be at variance with the recent plan of "nationalization." This may be seen by the following excerpts from the Mexican mining laws immediately preceding the new constitution, article 14 of which precludes retroactive effect.

Article 10 of the Mexican mining law of November 22, 1884, states that "the following substances are the exclusive property of the owner of the land, who may, therefore, develop and enjoy them without the formality of claim (denuncio) or special adjudication * * * petroleum and gaseous springs," etc.

The mining law of June 4, 1892, states that "the owner of land may freely work, without a special franchise in any case whatsoever, the following substances: Mineral fuels, oils, and mineral water," etc.

The mining law of November 25, 1909, effective January 1, 1910, states, in article 2, that "the following are the property of the owner of the soil: 1. Ore bodies or deposits of mineral fuels, of whatever form or variety," etc.

Article 27, however, of the Mexican constitution of 1917, states that "in the nation is vested direct ownership of * * * petroleum and all hydrocarbons—solid, liquid, or gaseous"; also that "only Mexicans by birth or naturalization and Mexican companies have the right to acquire ownership in lands, waters, and their appurtenances, or to obtain concessions to develop mines, waters, or mineral fuels in the Republic of Mexico. The nation may grant the same right to foreigners, provided they agree before the Department of Foreign Affairs to be considered Mexicans in respect to such property and accordingly not to invoke the protection of their Government in respect to the same, under penalty in case of breach of forfeiture to the nation of property so acquired."

On February 19, July 31, and August 12, 1918, decrees were issued making it necessary, under penalties of confiscation, for all companies owning or leasing oil lands in Mexico to file new "manifests" or properties already duly registered, which "manifests" apparently constitute the first step in the "nationalization" of petroleum in Mexico. In addition to the new registry, taxes referred to as "rentals" and "royalties" were imposed, which terms in themselves concede the national ownership mentioned in article 27 of the constitution. Continued operation of oil lands is conditioned upon "contracts" with the Government, these contracts to be fixed by regulations yet to be issued. The failure of the oil companies to file the "manifests" according to requirements resulted in a modification of the stringency of the decree of February 19 with regard to confiscation. The export tax of 10 per cent ad valorem, moreover, after being made nearly twice as heavy for July and August as for the two preceding months, has recently been reduced by the placing of lower valuations upon the petroleum to be taxed. * * *

Such is a brief statement of the significant facts. To this must be added, together with the protests of England, Holland, and France, the protest issued by the United States through Ambassador Fletcher on April 2, 1918, which declares that "the United States can not acquiesce in any procedure ostensibly or nominally in the form of taxation or the exercise of eminent domain, but really resulting in confiscation of private property and arbitrary deprivation of vested rights."

OUR NEED FOR PETROLEUM.

The demands of the war for fuel oil are constantly increasing. According to the United States Geological Survey reports for the first six months of 1918, United States petroleum stocks were reduced between January 1 and July 1, 1918, by 8,034,635 barrels (of 42 gallons each), which amounts to over 63,000 barrels daily. United States stocks on hand July 1, 1918, were 142,044,235 barrels, as against 165,179,183 barrels on July 1, 1917. With 3,000,000 tons of shipping to be released this year, much of it designed for fuel oil consumption, and a prospect of 8,000,000 tons for next year, the significance of the Mexican oil fields as a source of supply assumes unusual importance. A further extension of the "gasless Sunday" principle, of course, approaches the problem in another fashion.

MEXICAN OIL AS A FACTOR IN OUR PRESENT REQUIREMENTS.

The world's production of petroleum for 1917 was 503,708,000 barrels. To this amount the nine leading producing countries contributed as follows:

	Barrels.
United States (marketed)	340, 000, 000
Russia	65, 000, 000
Mexico	55, 293, 000
Dutch East Indies	14, 000, 000
India	8, 500, 000
Roumania	6, 500, 000
Galicia	5, 500, 000
Japan and Formosa	2, 800, 000
Peru	2, 500, 000

Mexico thus stands easily third as a producer, but, with Russian and other supplies cut off, and with a depletion of United States stocks amounting to 63,000 barrels daily, our interest in the Mexican output is obvious.

AMERICAN CAPITAL IN MEXICAN OIL.

The total foreign investments in Mexico, according to Commerce Reports for July 18, 1912 (see Latin American Circular No. 41), amounted at that date to $1,641,054,180, distributed as follows:

American	$1, 057, 770, 000
English	321, 302, 800
French	143, 446, 000

The American total lay chiefly in railroads, mining interests, bonds, bank deposits, and oil. Recent estimates put the amount of British and American capital invested in Mexican oil at $300,000,000, of which $200,000,000 is American. Among the prominent companies represented, either in production or in refining, are the Mexican Petroleum Co. (Doheny interests), one of whose subsidiaries is in the Huasteca Co.; the Mexican Eagle Oil Co. (Lord Cowdray interests); the Royal Dutch Shell Co. (in which British as well as Dutch interests figure largely); the East Coast Oil Co.; the Pennsylvania-Mexican Co.; the Pierce Oil Corporation (which took over in 1913 the Waters-Pierce Oil Co.); the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey; the Atlantic Oil Refining Co.; the Freeport and Tampico Fuel Oil Corporation; and the Texas Co.

The most interesting point about the American companies is that, apparently, not one of them has ever obtained a "concession" of land from the Mexican Government. Their contracts of purchase or lease, it is stated, have in every case been made with private owners, who held titles extending back often for more than 250 years.

CONCLUSION.

The successful prosecution of the present war as well as the future of American commerce depends upon our shipping facilities. An increasing number of our merchant vessels and of our battleships will be demanding large supplies of fuel oil. According to a bulletin just issued by the Smithsonian Institution, the available supply of petroleum underground in the United States is hardly adequate as a reserve. Since, then, we must turn to Mexico as one of our important sources of supply the oil situation in that country becomes an issue in which we are all concerned.

In its bearing upon our future commercial relations with Latin America, the status of our investments in Mexico involves far-reaching possibilities. If all our foreign investments were to be transferred from the state of property duly acquired, with guaranties of permanence, such as occur in the Mexican mining laws of 1884, 1892, and 1909, to the state of temporary concessions, requiring renewal from time to time by contracts, in the wording of which we have no share, we should face an unprecedented situation. Our commercial relations, not only with Mexico but with all of Latin America, depend upon mutual confidence. The liberal supplies which the United States has granted to Mexico, together with Ambassador Fletcher's note of April 2, constitute our side of the present case. A signal factor, however, will be the decision of the Mexican courts upon the suits now in progress.

Of course, the only "conclusion" which the diplomatic sense of the writer—or was it the State Department censor—would permit is that if these things are true, as the writer says they are true, "we should face an unprecedented situation." But even so, we should be grateful, either for the courage shown by the writer of that report or the indulgent forbearance shown by the State Department in permitting even this abbreviated breath of fresh air to penetrate our bedrugged and befuddled sense of national responsibility; to seep through the wearisome wreckage of a Mexican policy conceived in stupidity, based on a repudiation of our national honor, and supported by a popular ignorance for which the administration in large part has been responsible.

No doubt, had the freedom of action of the writer of this report been commensurate with his intelligence, he would have described this "unprecedented situation" in all its naked truth. But let us be grateful that he has been permitted to go so far.

Now, why are these facts—these stories of murderous outrages against American citizens and attempts by government illegally to confiscate their property in Mexico—brought before the American people virtually for the first time? Why only now are the people of the United States permitted to learn that their Department of State, at the behest of President Wilson, has sat back, with hands placidly folded, and permitted these and other outrages against our national self-respect to go unpunished and virtually unprotested? And what does the fact that these conditions are now permitted to be made known imply?

It means only this, that the policy of "hush" which the Department of State has imposed not only on public men but on the press of the country "to win the war" no longer will hold water. It means that the wrongs of our citizens in Mexico, who have suffered indignities and death in order to keep our warships supplied with fuel oil, who have walked unarmed and unprotected among armed bandits in a hostile land to help "win the war," now cry for redress in a voice that even the diplomatic "hush" of the Department of State no longer can keep from the ears of their fellow citizens at home.

It means that the time has come when this Government, gathering around it such tattered shreds of self-respect as our Mexican policy of eight years has left us, and which only our heroic course in the great war preserved from final and absolute extinction, must say to all foreign Governments, wheresoever they may be:

Whosoever attacks the life, property, and well-being of an American citizen attacks the American flag. Whosoever attacks the American flag, let him beware. The American people know only one answer; that given to the Imperial German Government, WHICH IS NO MORE.

I say, as would have my forbears: He who will not subscribe to that sentiment repudiates the proud title "American."

Americanizing the People of the District of Columbia.

OF

HON. RICHARD W. AUSTIN.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I submit facts and figures in support of House joint resolution 73, introduced by me, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution empowering Congress to give representation in House, Senate, and electoral college to residents of the District of Columbia. It reads as follows:

[Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, H. J. Res. 73; S. J. Res. 64.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 28, 1917.

Mr. AUSTIN introduced the following joint resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

Introduced by Mr. CHAMBERLAIN in the Senate, May 11, 1917, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving to Congress the power to extend the right of suffrage to residents of the District of Columbia.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed for ratification by the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid as a part of said Constitution, namely, insert at the end of section 3, Article IV, the following words:

"The Congress shall have power to admit to the status of citizens of a State the residents of the District constituting the seat of the Government of the United States, created by Article I, section 8, for the purpose of representation in the Congress and among the electors of President and Vice President and for the purpose of suing and being sued in the courts of the United States under the provisions of Article III, section 2.

"When the Congress shall exercise this power the residents of such District shall be entitled to elect one or two Senators as determined by the Congress, Representatives in the House according to their numbers as determined by the decennial enumeration, and presidential electors equal in number to their aggregate representation in the House and Senate.

"The Congress shall provide by law the qualifications of voters and the time and manner of choosing the Senator or Senators, the Representative or Representatives, and the electors herein authorized.

"The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing power."

DISTRICT WANTS NATIONAL REPRESENTATION.

While the people of the District differ widely concerning the best form of local government, they very largely agree in petitioning for national representation under the proposed constitutional amendment.

Washington, released from its war-time obligation to think solely of national service and sacrifice to help to win the war, is permitted to think and speak again for itself. And its first and most earnest petition is for Americanization, for representation, like other American communities, in Congress and the Electoral College.

Its first petition is for national representation, because it believes that through exercise of the power which such representation will give all other good things municipal that are strongly desired will be added to it.

This note is sounded in all the citizens' organizations as they resume their winter activities. The board of trade, the chamber of commerce, the Federation of Citizens' Associations, the Central Labor Union, and many other citizens' organizations have put on record their appreciation of the fact that the psychological moment approaches for a determined and united campaign to carry through Congress and the State legislatures the pending constitutional amendment, empowering Congress to grant representation to the District in Congress and the Electoral College.

Nearly all of the citizens' organizations of Washington, large and small, cooperate in the organization of the joint citizens' committee on national representation for the District of Columbia.

The organizations represented in the joint committee are as follows: Board of trade; chamber of commerce; Federation of Citizens' Associations, representing 30 sectional citizens' associations; Central Labor Union, representing 72 local unions and 6 local auxiliaries; Retail Merchants' Association; Monday Evening Club; Bar Association; Association of Oldest Inhabitants; District Delegate Association; Real Estate Brokers' Association; citizens' associations not represented in the federation, including Columbia Heights, East Washington, Georgetown, Northeast Washington, South Washington, and Southwest Citizens' Association; Citizens' Community of Forty in Favor of Popular Government for the District of Columbia; Twentieth Century Club.

Cooperating organizations: The local branch of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association and the American Federation of Labor.

At a recent conference of prominent representatives of the citizens' organizations represented in the citizens' joint committee on national representation for the District of Columbia it was resolved unanimously by a rising vote that the joint committee's campaign for national representation, checked by the war, should be renewed vigorously, and should be pushed promptly, earnestly, and steadily before the incoming Congress. Among those who participated in this conference were Walter A. Brown, president of the Board of Trade; Robert N. Harper, president of the Chamber of Commerce; W. B. Westlake, president Federation Citizens' Associations; Harry S. Hollohan, president Central Labor Union; C. J. Columbus, secretary Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association; Theodore W. Noyes, chairman citizens' joint committee; Louis Ottenberg, secretary citizens' joint committee; H. B. F. Macfarland, acting chairman committee on brief; A. Leftwich Sinclair, chairman committee on speakers; John Joy Edson, chairman committee on print publicity; W. T. Galliher, chairman finance committee; Albert Schulteis, chairman Chamber of Commerce national representation committee; E. C. Brandenburg, chairman campaign committee, Board of Trade; G. F. Bowerman, chairman campaign committee, Monday Evening Club; C. S. Shreve, vice chairman citizens' joint committee; Chapin Brown; E. C. Colladay; and ex-Representative James T. Lloyd.

The working committees of the joint committee are getting ready energetically for the campaign in the next Congress. Mr. A. S. Worthington, the chairman of the brief committee, is recovering from illness in Florida. The vice chairman of the committee, Mr. H. B. F. Macfarland, is serving as acting chairman, and this committee, intrusted with the preparation of the District's case for presentation at hearings before the congressional committees to which the constitutional amendment is to be referred, met on Monday at Mr. Macfarland's office and divided up the work of brief preparation, and this work is being vigorously pushed. This committee expects to be ready to present the District's case to Congress whenever the special session of the new Congress may be called. The members of this committee are as follows:

A. S. Worthington, chairman; H. B. F. Macfarland, vice chairman; H. H. Glassie, E. C. Brandenburg, Chapin Brown, E. F. Colladay, A. Leftwich Sinclair, John B. Larner, W. McK. Clayton, Theodore W. Noyes.

The historical and statistical data concerning the political status of Washington necessary for the preparation of the District's case are being gathered and formulated by a committee consisting of—

John B. Larner, chairman; W. B. Bryan, historian, vice chairman; Le Verne Beales, statistician, vice chairman; Allen C. Clark, William V. Cox, George F. Bowerman, J. Harry Shannon, James Hugh Keeley, A. M. Fisher.

This committee on historical and statistical facts, which functions in intimate association with the committee on brief, has already done valuable work. The committee met on Friday at Mr. Larner's office and renewed and broadened its labors. It will bring the statistical matter which it has collected thoroughly up to date.

For the presentation of the District's case to individual Members of Congress, to the Capital community, and to the country at large the working committees are the committee on speakers, A. Leftwich Sinclair, chairman; print publicity, John Joy Edson, chairman; and the outside campaign council, which is now being organized. Meetings of these committees are arranged for next week; also a metting of the finance committee, of which W. T. Galliher is chairman, and the other members of which are the presidents of the Board of Trade, the Chamber of Commerce, the Federation of Citizens' Associations, the Central Labor Union, the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association, and the Monday Evening Club.

CITIZENS' JOINT COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL REPRESENTATION FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The organizations represented in the joint committee on national representation for the District of Columbia are as follows:

Board of trade, 1,625 members.

Chamber of commerce, 1,200 members.

Federation of Citizens' Associations, representing 30 sectional citizens' associations, as follows:

These associations cover nearly the entire District, with an aggregate membership (estimated) of 7,500. Many of these sectional associations have, in addition to participation through the federation, separately indorsed District national representation through constitutional amendment and have appointed cooperating campaign committees.

Central Labor Union, representing 72 local unions and 6 local auxiliaries, with aggregate membership (estimated) of 48,000; Retail Merchants' Association, Monday Evening Club, Bar Association, Association of Oldest Inhabitants, District Delegate Association, Real Estate Brokers' Association.

Citizens' associations not represented in the federation, including Columbia Heights, East Washington, Georgetown, Northeast Washington, South Washington, and Southwest Citizens' Association.

Citizens' Committee of Forty in Favor of Popular Government for the District of Columbia.

Twentieth Century Club.

COOPERATING ORGANIZATIONS.

The local branch of the National American Woman's Suffrage Association.

The District's plea for national representation is condensedly stated in the following circular:

AMERICANIZE WASHINGTONIANS.

The 400,000 Americans of the District constitute the only community in all the expanse of the continental United States—populous, intelligent, public-spirited, of adequate resources—which is denied representation in the National Government.

As a suitor in the courts of the United States the District resident has, the Supreme Court says, a lower standing than an alien.

TO OBEY, TO PAY, TO FIGHT.

In relation to national laws the sole function of the District residents is to obey. They take no part in making the laws which they must obey.

In relation to national taxes their sole function is to pay. They have nothing to say, like other taxpayers, concerning the amount and kind of taxes they shall pay and how the tax money shall be spent.

In relation to national war their sole function is to fight in obedience to command. They have no voice, like other Americans, in the councils which determine war or peace. They have no representation in the Government which requires them to fight, to bleed, and perhaps to die.

National representation is a distinctive, basic right of the American citizen—in a Government of the people, by the people, for the people; in a Government which roots its justice in consent of the governed; in a representative Government which inseparably couples taxation and arms bearing as a soldier with representation.

Since the 400,000 Americans of the District pay national taxes, obey national laws, and go to war in the Nation's defense, they are entitled on American principles to be represented in the National Government which taxes them, which makes all laws for them, and which sends them to war.

NOT TO DISTURB NATIONAL CONTROL.

The constitutional amendment which we urge empowers Congress to correct this inequity without disturbing in the slightest national control of the Capital or the present form of municipal government. Congress retains every power in these respects that it now possesses. All that happens will be that the District becomes a small fractional part of that Congress, and politically an integral part of the Nation which that Congress represents.

National representation will clothe the Washingtonian with a vital American privilege, to which he is undeniably in equity entitled, will cleanse him of the stigma and stain of un-Americanism, and, curing his political impotency, will arm him with a certain power.

It will relieve the Nation of the shame of un-Americanism at its heart and of impotency to cure this evil.

It will inflict no injury or hardship upon either Nation or Capital to counteract these benefits.

Consistency and justice, national pride and self-respect, the will to efface a shameful blot from the national escutcheon, the spirit of true Americanism and righteous hatred of autocracy in any guise, the patriotic impulse toward full preparedness of the Nation as a champion of democracy and representative government everywhere in the world—all combine to make irresistible at this very moment our appeal for the adoption of this amendment.

ANALYSIS OF PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

It is to be noted first that it is not proposed that the Constitution as amended shall give national representation directly and immediately to the District. The amendment merely empowers Congress in its discretion to give us this representation, and provides the machinery and supplementary powers which will be necessary when Congress decides to exercise this power.

Why does the District modestly ask so little? In order that it may not in the end secure nothing.

A constitutional amendment has a long road and a hard road to travel. It must run the gantlet of two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the State legislatures. The burden which it carries must be reduced to a minimum.

The joint resolution effects the vital essential of the ideal constitutional amendment. Nothing whatever should be sought through a two-thirds vote of Congress and a three-fourths vote of the States which can be secured through a majority vote of Congress. An absolute minimum of alteration of the Constitution, effecting only the vitally necessary change, should be proposed by amendment.

The proposed amendment does not directly and immediately give to Washingtonians national representation, but it takes that vital privilege from inaccessibility and places it within reach. After its adoption only a majority vote of Congress will be required to do equity in this matter, whereas now a two-thirds vote of Congress and a three-fourths vote of the State legislatures are necessary.

Its sole effect is to remedy an acknowledged evil and to do equity by empowering Congress to declare the political and judicial status of the residents of the seat of government.

All of the controverted issues concerning the make-up of the local electorate, the qualifications of voters, and the form of local government, upon which both Washingtonians and our national legislators radically differ among themselves, are postponed to be decided by the majority vote of Congress after the great and vital question of the constitutional status of the Washingtonian has been answered.

A proposed constitutional amendment affecting the District is doomed to defeat which provokes the active opposition of either Democrats or Republicans; of progressives, conservatives, or reactionaries; of prohibitionists or antiprohibitionists; of those for or against a liquor referendum or any other kind of referendum; of those who either favor or oppose votes for women; of those who advocate or oppose an educational or property qualification for voters; of those who favor or condemn a change in the form of local government; of single taxers or antisingle taxers; of champions or belittlers of the half-and-half law; and of those who either advocate or abominate the "new nationalizing" of Washington.

In short, any active group of Americans sufficiently strong to be able to influence one-third of either House of Congress can defeat this constitutional amendment.

The proposition, however, is now so stripped of every strife-breeding feature and so centered upon a single principle of undeniable equity that all of Washington can enthusiastically get behind it and push it to success. It is so worded as to reduce to a minimum opposition to its immediate passage.

NO DECREASE OF POWER OF CONGRESS.

The proposed constitutional amendment giving Congress power to grant national representation to the residents of the seat of Government—in respect to whom it already has the power to exercise exclusive legislation—does not lessen but increases the power of Congress. It extends on natural, logical, and equitable lines an existing power of Congress.

This provision is appropriately inserted at the end of section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution, which gives to Congress power to admit new States and to make all needful regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States from which these new States are carved. It is under this section that new Senators, Representatives, and Territorial Delegates come to the Capitol. The three political subdivisions of the United States under the Constitution are States, Territories—incipient States—and the District constituting the seat of Government of the United States. When the proposed amendment is adopted this section will be rounded out and perfected and the power of Congress in respect to national representation will be equitably extended to all three of the parts into which the United States was thus in the beginning in effect divided.

The Constitution does not define the political status of the future population of "such District—not exceeding 10 miles square—as may by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress become the seat of the Government of the United States." Nor does it explicitly and undeniably give the power to Congress to define or change this status so that it shall approximate gradually the status of the citizens of a State.

IN STATUS LESS THAN ALIENS.

It has resulted from this unintentional omission or oversight that the residents of "such District" have a standing as suitors in the courts of the United States which the Supreme Court has said is less than that of aliens, and a relation to participation in national legislation and presidential elections which is the same as that of aliens.

It was not intended that "such District" should remain uninhabited. The United States advertised its Washington lots for sale not only in the Republic but in Europe, and attracted settlers and lot purchasers here by glowing assurances. George Washington predicted that the Capital's population would in a century be certainly exceeded only by that of London. It was not intended that these inhabitants should be from any point of view permanently aliens.

It was not intended that the people of the Capital should forever remain politically outside of the United States, no matter what the number and character of the population. Sympathetic commiseration of the District's lack of national representation has been expressed in Congress and the White House at intervals from 1800 down to the present day.

When it had only the population and resources which entitled its people to the nominal representation of a territorial delegate, a voteless legislative agent in the House, not contemplated by the Constitution, that representation was vigorously urged by President Jackson, was heartily seconded by President Johnson, and was given under President Grant.

DISTRICT NATIONAL REPRESENTATION.

The words of these Presidents and of a long series of national legislators and other statesmen, who argued forcibly and convincingly for Territorial representation for the few residents of the District in their time, are to-day equally sound and convincing arguments for full national representation for the present District. In 1919 genuine and equitable American representation for the residents of the seat of government approximates their status to that of citizens of a State and not of a Territory. A voteless, almost negligible, Territorial Delegate is obviously inadequate.

The seat of government of the United States now has an intelligent, American, public-spirited population exceeding that in 1910—the latest national census—of six of the States—Nevada, Wyoming, Delaware, Arizona, Idaho, and New Mexico. Its population then was 331,069. It was shown by the last police census to approximate 400,000. Including the army of new war workers, it is half a million to-day. The population represented under the latest apportionment by each Representative in the House is 212,407.

The time has now come when the Nation should by constitutional amendment either give direct to the residents of the seat of government the status of citizens of a State for the purpose of national representation only, or should at least, as proposed by our pending constitutional amendment, give to Congress the power to declare, in its discretion, when they shall have this status to the extent of enjoying this national representation.

WHAT IT DOES AND WHAT IT DOES NOT.

The constitutional amendment which Washington urges (H. J. Res. 73 and S. J. Res. 64) does not propose the admission of the District of Columbia into the Union as a sovereign State; it does not propose the destruction of the "10-miles-square" provision of the Constitution; it does not lessen in the smallest degree the control by the Nation of the "10 miles square."

It does not disturb in any way the financial relation of Nation and Capital. It is not based upon either the abolition or the retention of the half-and-half law.

It is not complicated with changes in the municipal government of the District in respect to which Washingtonians widely and radically differ.

It repeals nothing; it destroys nothing. It alarms no one, alienates no one, wounds nobody's sensitiveness.

WHAT THE AMENDMENT DOES.

This constitutional amendment assumes that the Nation will continue to control its Capital through Congress and asserts that the time is close at hand when the people of the Capital should be represented in that Congress. The 10-miles-square provision of the Constitution sets up a peculiar political entity—not a State, not a Territory—under the exclusive control of the Nation. This amendment is supplementary to the 10-miles-square provision. It says, in effect, that after a century of increase and development the Americans collected in the seat of government, entitled at all times to every American right and privilege consistent with continued national control of the Capital, are now or soon will be entitled to representation in the National Government.

It enables Congress to make Americans of a community of 400,000 people who are now politically aliens and to naturalize for the purpose of representation in the National Government a city slightly larger than Minneapolis and slightly smaller than New Orleans.

The constitutional provision establishing the 10 miles square is responsible for the monstrous paradox of unrepresentative government at the Capital of the great Republic. This constitutional amendment will ultimately correct it.

Our proposed legislation is supplementary to existing law, adapting the latter better to the conditions and needs of to-day. It is thoroughly constructive. It is not in the smallest particular destructive.

It leaves undisturbed and confirms the national control of the Nation's city and the corresponding national obligation of adequate financial participation in the maintenance and upbuilding of the National Capital. The act of 1878 and the exclusive legislation clause of the Constitution are alike untouched.

It enables Congress to make American citizens of the people of this community, giving them effective representation in Congress, their local and national legislature, which may deprive them of their property by taxation, and of life or limb by sending them to war. Such representation is not inconsistent with the exclusive power of legislation concerning the District possessed by Congress. On the contrary, such representation is the more essential since Congress is not only Washington's national legislature but its municipal and State legislature. The effect of this amendment is not to admit the District into the Union as a State but to enable Congress to give to the 400,000 Americans residing in the 10 miles square under the exclusive control of Congress the same representation as citizens of a State in Congress and the Electoral College.

A NEW POLITICAL STATUS.

Not a new State but a new political status is to be evolved. This amendment operates as a supplement of the 10-miles-square provision, empowering Congress to define explicitly, in view of the changes of more than a century, the political status of the residents of the Federal District. It will alter the existing law of congressional and Electoral College representation and will create a new American constituency with representation in Congress and the Electoral College; not a new State but a politically uplifted District of Columbia, an enfranchised 10 miles square already created and made unique by the Constitution. This new factor in our scheme of National Government representation may be unusual, peculiar, extraordinary; but it is not so unusual, peculiar, and extraordinary as the original creation and present-day retention by the great Republic of the totally unrepresented 10 miles square, the seat of government, a district physically within the United States, even containing its Capital, but politically outside of the United States.

The States uniting under the Constitution had the power, which they exercised, of creating this unique, unrepresented, Capital-containing, Nation-controlled District. Two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the States have the same power, which they should exercise, to give to the 400,000 people of this unique District an equally unique political status.

Who is there in all the world who does not think that the 400,000 Americans in the seat of government of the United States are entitled to representation in the Legislature which alone makes laws for them and taxes them and may send every man of them to war, perhaps to be wounded or killed? Who contends that these 400,000 Americans are not as intelligent, as patriotic, as public-spirited, as American, in short, as the same number of Americans anywhere else in the United States, or as the smaller number of Americans collected in six of the States?

What new State has ever been admitted to the Union which at the time of admission had so large, so intelligent, and so thoroughly American a population as the District? What new State at the time of admission, measured as to its taxable resources, was raising so much in local taxes and contributing so much in national taxes as the District of Columbia? The District to-day is contributing in national taxes, to be disbursed by a legislature in which it is not represented, a greater amount absolutely than 22 of the States and a greater amount per capita than 36 of the States.

STATEHOOD NOT DEMANDED.

Though the District can make this showing of fitness for admission to the Union as a sovereign State, no demand for such admission is presented. Our proposed legislation confirms the national control of the Nation's city and the exclusive legislation clause of the Constitution is untouched.

All that is asked is that the Constitution empower Congress to declare that residents of the seat of government are on the same footing as citizens of the States in relation only to Congress, the Electoral College, and the courts of the United States.

This action, though it will Americanize a community, now politically alien, which is larger than Minneapolis, and will empower Congress to enlarge the basis of congressional representation, does not bring into the Union a new sovereign State.

Surely Congress will not quibble or delay in cooperating to secure to itself by constitutional amendment the power to cure the evil and shame of completely nonrepresentative government in the seat of government of the great representative Republic. To accomplish this good end Congress ought not to hesitate to propose to the States this enlargement of its own powers. Surely Congress does not distrust itself.

The injury to the Nation from this condition is as great as that inflicted upon the de-Americanized community. The national shame is the greater.

IS THE NATION IMPOTENT?

It is sometimes suggested that the Nation is impotent to cure this evil and this shame; that the condition is unchangeable.

This suggestion is an insult to American character and capacity. No other capital of any other nation is degraded below other cities in national representation. No excuse is found in the fact that our Capital is in a nation-controlled district. Mexico and Brazil and Argentina have copied this feature of our Constitution. As nations they control, like the United States, federal districts in which their capitals are located, but they have not found themselves impotent to give full national representation to the residents of these capitals.

Is Washington in some way defective or tainted and unfit to stand on the same representative footing as Buenos Aires, Rio, or Mexico City?

Is the American Republic less devoted to the principles of representative government and less capable of enforcing them than Argentina, Brazil, or Mexico?

Who will confess permanent national impotency to free residents of the seat of government from the class of defective and delinquent Americans? Or to rid the Nation itself of a canker at the heart of the body politic, collecting alien matter, and threatening blood poisoning?

MAIN OBJECTIONS TO DISTRICT NATIONAL REPRESENTATION.

(1) Congress will not grant it without destroying the half-and-half provision of the act of 1878. The Nation will not do political equity without violating financial equity.

(2) The District voting constituency, on account of the percentage of its people with voting residence in the States and the colored percentage of the population, is and will be unfit for such national representation.

(1) The first objection is an undeserved slur upon Congress. (2) The second objection is an undeserved slur upon the people of Washington. (3) Neither objection applies at all to the pending constitutional amendment, which merely empowers Congress to grant national representation to the District when such action seems to Congress to be equitable and when in the opinion of Congress the people of the Capital are fit to be Americanized.

BOTH POLITICAL AND FINANCIAL EQUITY.

How can Congress defend a threat to withhold or violate financial equity if Washington successfully petitions to it for political equity? The recent fiscal investigation convinced Congress and the Nation that the local community was contributing not too little but more than its share to the maintenance and development of the Capital; that the Nation itself was contributing not too much but too little for the same purpose.

If we now proposed to destroy national control of the Capital through Congress and to transfer that control to a new sovereign State of Columbia, there might be force to the suggestion that as obligation goes with power the national obligation would cease if the national power over the Capital ceased. But District national representation by constitutional amendment does not in the slightest lessen national power and control in the District, and consequently does not reduce in the slightest the national obligation.

When the District secures voting representation in Congress it will simply become a small fractional part politically of the Nation which that Congress represents, and its half million people will be placed on equal terms in national representation at least with any other half million of Americans among the millions in the rest of the continental and contiguous United States.

We shall become through our representatives a part of Congress, but we shall take no power from that Congress. Since national power and the control in respect to the Capital are unimpaired, the national obligation to participate in maintenance and development of the National Capital is unimpaired also.

National representation for the District will furnish, therefore, no excuse for Congress to become a shirker and a slacker in respect to capital legislation and appropriation. Congress will control the Capital as before, and will be solely responsible for District legislation, whether or not the District is represented in it.

Representation in Congress will never be granted the District unless it is demonstrated to be an American vital privilege which, under all the conditions, equity demands. If its equity is thus demonstrated, will it not be an insult to impute to Congress the inconceivable meanness of refusing financial equity if political equity is successfully sought?

TWO EQUITIES HAND IN HAND.

Instead of being antagonistic the half-and-half plan and national representation for the District are sympathetic and supplemental. Both are manifestations of the spirit of "fair play for Washington." Both are rooted in the principle of a "square deal for the Capital." Equity for the Nation's city involves both financial equity and political equity, and the two equities go hand in hand.

Whatever one has in mind as beneficial to Washington, if it is to be secured from Congress, is brought nearer to realization by adoption of this amendment. For it prepares the way for Washingtonians to get voting power in a body in which they are now impotent; and their ability and their likelihood to secure any of this desired legislation will be infinitely enlarged.

It has been said that the political equity of national representation can not be enjoyed by the District without sacrifice of financial equity in its relation to the Nation. On the contrary, this political equity of national representation is the strongest and perhaps the only reliable guaranty of stability of the Nation in financial equity toward the people of the Capital. The half-and-half law is not disturbed in the slightest by national representation. Its continued existence is, on the other hand, guaranteed as long as it remains equitable; and when the time comes to frame a substitute for this law national representation will arm the District with power to cause the succeeding financial system to be based upon the principles of justice and wisdom in which the half-and-half law is rooted.

Thus national representation, instead of destroying the half-and-half law or the principle of financial equity upon which it is founded, will strengthen and confirm that principle, so vital to the Capital's welfare.

ARE WASHINGTONIANS DEFECTIVE AND UNFIT?

Slurs upon Washington's voting constituency of the past, recent or remote, have no application to the future voting constituency under the proposed constitutional amendment. The only votes promised under this amendment are for Senators, Representatives, and presidential electors. If the resident of the District can vote for these officers in Washington, he will in almost every case elect to vote here instead of in a State. The class of Washingtonians with voting residence in the States will practically be emptied. It has been steadily dwindling, through restrictive State laws, through the local home-making tendency of the merit system, and, with the elimination of passes and rate concessions, through the increased expense of railroad transportation of voters to distant States. It will almost disappear if one may vote here for President and Congress.

With substantially all of our population voting in the District, a voting constituency results which is adequate in quantity and which is unsurpassed in quality in any State of the Union.

Our business and professional men, the educational, scientific, literary, and artistic elements of our population, our workingmen in public and private employ, our department clerks and other Government employees, our winter residents in process of conversion into Washingtonians, combine to constitute one of the strongest, most intelligent, most public spirited, and most American communities in the whole Republic.

What new State has ever been admitted to the Union which at the time of admission had so large, so intelligent, and so thoroughly American a population as the District? What new State at the time of admission, measured as to its taxable resources, was raising so much in local taxes and contributing so much in national taxes as the District?

The suggestion that the 26 per cent colored population of the District is unfit to vote, that this 26 per cent fraction of the voters will dominate the 74 per cent white vote, and that, as a final result, the whole voting constituency of the District becomes tainted, incurably defective, and delinquent, slurs with cruel injustice not merely the colored population but the whole Capital community, which is thus branded as un-American and impotent to set up a white man's government.

NOTE.—The percentage of colored population steadily decreases. The war growth of Washington has added more than 100,000 to the city's population, nearly all whites, and to the extent that the war population is retained in peace time (and experience shows that a large fraction of this war increase remains at the Capital) the colored percentage will be still further reduced.

This suggestion is based upon the assumption that the colored population of to-day has not developed since the first decade after the Civil War in education, in efficiency, in morality, or in Americanism. It ignores the fact that in contrast with the organized masses of foreign illiterates, disloyal and dangerous, that are herded in industries and at the polls in many other large American cities, the colored population here has creditably increased its percentage of literacy, has acquired small holdings of property aggregating a considerable amount, whose possession has made thousands of conservative, "safe and sane" colored citizens, and finally, in response to every test, has shown itself in the mass instinctively obedient to constituted authority and loyal to the Republic as citizens and soldiers.

This suggestion also assumes that no more whites of Washington will turn out to vote for President or Senator or Representative than voted for an impotent "feather-duster" legislature in the last century or in farcical elections for delegates to partisan presidential nominating conventions in this century. It assumes that the Washington white men can not in contention over any race issue hold their own against much less than half their number of colored men. It insults by the slur of inefficiency and unfitness a community which in peace and war has made an unsurpassed record of public spirit and of exalted Americanism in service, in patriotic devotion, and in full, hearty, and unstinted response to every demand of self-sacrifice made upon Americans.

In the light of Washington's fine war records, with which every one of us is familiar, and of which we all are proud, the moment is peculiarly inopportune to suggest that the 400,000 Americans of the Capital are the only Americans in the mainland United States who remain unfit for representation in their National Legislature, which makes national laws for them, imposes national taxes upon them, and sends them forth as national soldiers and sailors to fight, to bleed, and perhaps to die.

BOTH OBJECTIONS ARE IRRELEVANT.

But if this slur upon Washington, colored and white, were thoroughly deserved at this time, no reason would thereby be found to oppose the pending constitutional amendment. For this amendment does not directly and immediately admit the Washington defectives and delinquents to national representation. It merely empowers Congress in its discretion at some future time to admit District residents to the status of citizens of a State for the purpose of national representation, and also provides the machinery to be utilized when Congress wishes to exercise this power.

It does not take any power whatsoever from Congress. On the contrary, its only effect is to enlarge the powers of Congress.

Congress now has the power to grant full national representation to the people of a Territory by admitting it to statehood. The constitutional provision giving to the Nation, through Congress, exclusive control over the seat of government deprives Congress of the power of giving to residents of the District full statehood. The pending constitutional amendment is an enabling act for Congress, empowering, but not directing, it to admit District residents to the status of citizens of a State only so far as will not disturb the national exclusive control of the Capital by the Nation through Congress. Voting representation of the District in Congress will clearly not affect control of the District by Congress.

In the Republic's political history it has sometimes happened that partisan apprehension that a new State would be opposed to the party in power has caused that party to prevent admission of the territory to statehood, even though it was fit in every respect. Such partisan fears, if any should exist in respect to the admission of the District to national representation, would naturally arise and result in acts only when that admission was directly and immediately sought and was imminent. They would not logically justify opposition to the pending constitutional amendment.

If this amendment passes Congress will only have the same power to give part of the privileges of statehood to the District that it now has to give all of these privileges to Alaska or Hawaii.

If after this amendment is adopted Congress thinks that for any reason, partisan or otherwise, the time is not yet ripe for national representation for the District the admission of Washingtonians to this status will be postponed. If the political party in control of Congress at that time is convinced that "admission" of the District will create a Senator or Senators and Representatives controlled by the partisan enemy that party has the same opportunity to block and postpone admission that both parties have had and have exercised in the past in the case of many of the Territorial applicants for statehood after they were fitted for admission in population and resources.

Washington applies to two-thirds of Congress to empower Congress, whenever Congress pleases, to give national representation to District residents; to give to the seat of Government the same possibility of national representation that Hawaii and Alaska now possess.

What Washingtonian can be imagined as opposing this amendment, which dignifies and exalts his American status, and neither inflicts nor threatens any injury to anybody?

What Senator or Representative can be imagined as opposing an amendment which merely extends an existing power of Congress on logical and equitable lines, and which simply empowers Congress to correct political inequity whenever it sees fit to do so?

Washington is asking by constitutional amendment, requiring two-thirds vote of Congress, only what is absolutely essential to be secured in this way. If more were asked by constitutional amendment, nothing whatever could secure the necessary two-thirds vote.

All of the controverted issues concerning the make-up of the local electorate, the qualifications of voters, and the form of local government, upon which Washingtonians radically differ, are now postponed, to be decided by the majority vote of Congress after the great and vital question of the constitutional status of the Washingtonian has been answered.

Surely no Washingtonian will contend that the District should not by constitutional amendment be placed on the same basis as Alaska or Hawaii in respect to the possibility of national representation, or that Congress should not then in its discretion by a majority vote grant such equitable representation.

Surely Congress will not quibble or delay in cooperating to give to itself by constitutional amendment the power at the right time to cure the evil and shame of completely nonrepresentative government of the seat of government of the great American Republic.

DISTRICT'S WAR RECORD—SOLDIERS AND MONEY.

The District of Columbia has given to the service 17,945 soldiers, sailors, and marines (officers and men), including National Guardsmen, selective-service men, volunteers, and those enlisting in near-by State regiments and other military units. It is estimated that nearly one-half of this number has served in the Army and Navy in Europe, and many have been killed or wounded in action, died from disease, or are among the missing.

Under date of December 10 the Secretary of War caused to be issued an honorable-mention order, in which he eulogized the heroism and bravery of the District of Columbia soldiers in the engagements in which they fought so gallantly.

Gen. March reports (Feb. 15) that the District supplied 15,930 soldiers, surpassing New Hampshire, New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, Vermont, Delaware, and Nevada.

In addition to the contribution of its splendid young manhood to the world war, the people of the District have liberally subscribed of their limited means to help win the war as follows:

	District of Columbia quota.	Total.
First liberty loan	$15,000,000	$19,000,000
Second liberty loan	23,000,000	26,050,550

In the internal revenue war taxes for the fiscal year ending June 30 last the District contributed $2,575,909.51, exceeding in war contributions 20 States—Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Maine, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North Dakota, Utah, Vermont, Washington, and Wyoming.

Post Office Appropriations.

HON. WILLIAM H. KING, OF UTAH,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Saturday, February 1, 1919.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13308) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have upon a number of occasions called attention to the painful and costly experiences of the Government as a result of the impractical and oftentimes visionary and absurd schemes which officials of the Government inaugurated. All sorts of fads and experiments are conducted by agencies and officials of the Government, many of them in the face of all business experience, and still others in contravention of the letter, if not the spirit, of the fundamental law of the land. Prussian socialism and a tyrannous paternalism seem to be the goal many officials seek to reach. One of the schemes of some of the officials of the Post Office Department was the establishment of a "motor-truck service" ostensibly for the purpose of transporting the products of farm and field to market. Of course, back of the scheme was the design to have the Government engage in the transportation of the products of the country. This statement is warranted by the report which I shall call attention to in a moment, wherein it is stated "that it seems to be the purpose of the motor-truck service to enter the field—transcontinental, perhaps, in scope—as a system in competition with railroads," and so forth.

Under the pretext of aiding the farmer to dispose of his foodstuffs, and taking advantage of the war spirit and the feeling that food production must be stimulated, an appropriation was solicited and received in 1918 for the purpose of "experimenting with motor-truck service." One of the branches of the Post Office Department, wishing to extend its power and activities and increase enormously the number of employees therein, urged an appropriation to carry on such an experiment. An appropriation was made and experiments were conducted. It is needless to say that the experiments were conducted under the most favorable conditions that could be obtained by the proponents of the measure. An examination of the report indicates that those who had charge of the experiments did not proceed in a fair or proper way, but rather evinced a purpose to secure a favorable verdict regardless of the facts. In other words, the plan seems to have been to secure a verdict favorable to the experiments by questionable methods and regardless of the facts. The whole scheme seems to have been directed by the bureau of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and under its control and direction.

The Postmaster General felt constrained to have a thorough investigation made in regard to the motor-truck service, in order that he might advise Congress concerning the future operations of the same. Thereupon he directed the chief inspector to select the ablest postal experts and require that they should make "a thorough investigation of these motor-truck routes." Mr. Sutton, the chief inspector, selected Mr. Robert H. Baxclay, and there were associated with him other inspectors of tested ability and experience. The investigating committee as constituted consisted of Robert H. Baxclay, in charge; Inspectors Charles C. Hart, G. B. Miller, W. J. Opdyke, W. C. Volkerding, George E. Brill, W. E. Williamson, G. M. Brown, A. C. Garrigns, and J. G. Hogy. They were directed to make "a careful and thorough investigation of the motor-vehicle truck service," and the facts developed were to be fully and clearly set forth in a report to be by them submitted. They were also directed to approach the subject with "open minds and without any preconceived opinions on the question as to whether the service was practical and whether its extension would be a wise postal policy." The inspectors were directed to consult "freely the Bureau of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and to give such bureau every opportunity to present any and all information it might have." This commission made a thorough investigation and submitted a report—which I obtained this morning—containing 152 printed pages. The Postmaster General in submitting the report to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads states that he has carefully read the same and feels "constrained to concur in the findings made and the conclusions reached." In view of the findings, the Postmaster General asked that the estimate of $300,000 for the continuance of the experiment be reduced to $70,000.

It is apparent that the Postmaster General feels that the plan is chimerical, unwise, and improper. However, in order to establish beyond all question the results of the plan, he is willing to conduct experiments during the coming year at a cost not to exceed $70,000. The report submitted by the inspectors is a severe arraignment of the methods employed by the bureau of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General in conducting experiments, and is a condemnation of the plan itself. I shall insert at this point as a part of my remarks a portion of the summary and conclusions submitted by the inspectors:

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS.

Motor-truck service not primarily designed for competitive transportation of mails, but adapt itself to needs of food producers.

Routes are conducted in competition with other established service and claiming revenues not actually earned.

Carrying of first-class mail predominates as earning factor of claimed revenues, for which business there is apparent intent to adapt schedules.

Statistics of earnings, tabulated by Fourth Assistant's office, includes war tax on letter mail, which should not be included.

Postage on fourth-class matter, carriage of which is specified object of motor-truck service, is comparatively small part of so-called revenue.

Office of Fourth Assistant contends that motor-route service has right to consider as earned revenue value of postage on all mail carried, regardless of share of service performed.

The stated method of computing revenues is not right in reason or acceptable business practice.

Motor-route service can at best aspire to recognition as another—and very expensive—instrument of public utility awaiting test of time and need.

Report does not accept service as necessary adjunct of postal establishment, nor wholly oppose it as unworthy of trial, but seeks to correct appearance of enormous earnings, that subject may be considered in true light.

Current operating expenses not furnished, but known to be greatly increasing with advent of storms and bad roads.

Expenses shown cover only season of good roads and of highest productivity and earnings from transportation of produce.

Operating mile costs have increased since August, while mile earnings are decreasing.

Increase in food production has not been due to establishment of motor-truck service.

Postage on fourth-class mail has increased only 2.5 per cent of total on all matter since September. Other classes provide over 82 per cent of total theoretical revenue.

Reported earnings are greater than in fact by reason of improper methods of computation.

Impossible to reduce to figures "the revenue derived in addition to that which would be obtained through the usual and customary mail facilities in the absence of motor vehicle truck route service," but this additional revenue is small.

Motor-truck service is not entitled to all credit for increased postal earnings, but must share with other mail service facilities.

Motor-route service has not materially increased new postal business, except in eggs, mushrooms, and specialties.

Routes conducted in right locality and strictly in interest of food producers may possibly in time increase output.

Individual instances of large shipments on special occasions not indicative general increase in production.

Special beneficiaries are paying only small part of cost of service as a whole.

Postage on mushrooms, new business, Pennsylvania to New York, is not paying costs of transportation.

Value of postage stamps on transit or transferable mail is no more revenue for motor-truck service than is mail carried on trains revenue of railroad.

Only postage on "new business" and postage on mail from post offices wholly dependent on motor route should be considered even as theoretical revenue to compare with costs, and the possibility of cheaper service by other means may be available.

As created, "new business" may be claimed postal revenue arising from increased production if solely due to operation of motor-truck service; also postage on matter now sent by motor-truck route in preference to express service. Probably temporary, as express service is improving.

Department can not undertake to permit patrons to dictate a special and particular handling of their mail.

Mail diversions in conjunction with curtailment of rail and electric service have been of little or no benefit to the service as a whole, except saving of damage to perishable and fragile matter by more careful treatment of motor-truck handling.

If cheaper rail or electric service were restored or added to all reasonable public requirements would be met.

Forced apparent value is given motor-truck service by scheduling it to leave important points slightly in advance of trains.

Motor-truck routes are mainly established on information secured by correspondence, and installed by agent of Fourth Assistant, who instructs postmasters to divert mail from other channels if advancement can be made in either delivery or dispatch. Such mail is frequently diverted without benefit to the service, sometimes with resultant delay.

Diverted mail is often carried only a short distance in transit, apparently to show postage revenue, and then discharged for further transportation by trains. Pamphlet instructions to postmasters from Fourth Assistant directs them to send by motor truck mail of all classes "that can thereby be advanced either in delivery or dispatch," both terms being used, evidently with purpose.

It is good mail-service logic that instructions for dispatch and diversion of mail should emanate from Office of Second Assistant, who is fully informed as to current train schedule changes, as is not Office of Fourth Assistant. Otherwise danger of diversions being made on apparently justifiable, but not supportable, grounds, with consequent delays to mail.

Temporary suspensions of service and delays on motor routes are not infrequent, occasioning failure of supply to solely dependent offices and inconvenience to patrons. No provision is made for supplemental service. Postmasters are instructed to employ no such service, but to permit supply to lapse until repairs are made and motor service resumed. It is taking an unwarrantable risk to divert mail from regular channels to an experimental one.

The idea of designating as revenue the postage on mail picked up at one office and delivered to another for rail connection and further transportation, is wrong, as such carriage may be only an infinitesimal part of total distance the mail must travel.

Motor-truck routes show large revenues which prove to be derived from hauling quantities of mail for short distances only. Reports of mail handled show only place of loading, and never place of delivery. Other than a short haul, service performed on the trip may be very slight and a fictitious value is given the route, as no person examining the report can determine otherwise.

Motor-truck routes acquire a defensible schedule value because of having been installed in substitution for cheaper service.

Motor-truck routes, while expensive, have some merit where they traverse sections where not in competition with rail lines. They can not be expected to take the place of rural routes, or speaking generally, of star routes.

Motor routes may be established in place of long star routes or a chain of star routes where contract price demanded is excessive. Establishment of motor-route service can be advocated only in situations where they can be operated at less cost than contract service or in localities where conditions are favorable to encouragement of increased food production.

Motor-truck routes sometimes pass through districts that are at a considerable distance from railroads, but operated as a whole as group routes are practically everywhere in competition with and extensively parallel railway and electric lines. Only at nonrailroad or no-agent points can they be called commercially nonparallel and noncompetitive.

It seems to be the purpose of motor-truck service to enter the field, transcontinental, perhaps, in scope, as a system in competition with railroads, etc.

The process and labor of handling mail in transit adds an item against general expense as indirect cost. Admitting that motor-truck service entails less such indirect cost it is still much more expensive than railroad service with all indirect costs considered.

"City distribution" of letter mail is made in railway post-office trains and on arrival at large cities such mail is sent direct from trains to the city postal station where delivery is to be made. If carried into city by motor truck this mail must be taken to general post office for distribution and dispatch to postal station, entailing additional handling and delay.

Mail is now handled by motor truck in small quantity only and organized facilities are made use of. If handled in large quantity, vastly increased facilities would need to be provided at greatly increased cost; heavy transfers at numerous created junction points would need to be made, with consequent multiplicity of handlings. In brief, a new, extensive, and costly operating plant would have to be installed. Transportation of mail by motor truck sacrifices the advantage of en route distribution such as is performed in railway post-offices and tends to reversion to the old-fashion "distributing post office," with attendant inefficiency and delays.

It seems advisable to abandon the idea of "through interstate connecting motor-truck parcel-post service" and competing for the business of carrying miscellaneous mails on schedules now selected mainly for that purpose and turn every energy toward giving most and attractive service to first-hand producers of food—the farmers.

Motor trucks should start in early morning from producing rural communities and carry produce to city for market disposal the same day. This was the intent of originators of the service, but the idea has expanded to embrace competitive carrying between large cities, for which character of service there is no real need.

Costs of motor-truck service are advancing with advent of seasonal storms, etc. Regularity of service in winter can not be assured.

Motor-truck routes have undoubtedly been established over unsuitable roads, in unproductive districts, etc., solicited for the purpose of securing Government assistance in road improvement.

Farmers have not made general use of motor service for transportation of produce to consumers. It has been suggested this is because rural routes do not emanate from large cities. Nearly 3,000 rural routes emanate from first-class offices and thousands of others reach small offices having direct rail connections with large cities. They did not use these facilities prior to establishment of motor routes. They are habituated to other attractive methods of marketing and will not use motor routes unless greater convenience is offered. The matter of finding a buyer when goods are ready for market and of the consumer being able to procure the kind and quantity of goods when he wants them, as well as the difficult problem of credit, stands as an unsurmounted barrier to successful operation of system.

Producer-to-consumer trade has developed to only a limited degree, though diligent effort along this line has been made at many large offices within the past three years. The most marked development has been effected by post-office employees having advantage of postal agencies and facilities similar to those supplied by "middlemen."

Express companies, electric lines, railroads, public auto trucks, etc., furnish cheaper transportation for produce with less exacting requirements, etc., and perform other services not undertaken by the Post Office Department.

In a number of situations motor-truck routes duplicate travel over like routes. In view of great expense, some of this might be eliminated.

Routes are in operation in districts where production of excess foodstuffs can hardly be looked for.

A number of routes in operation are not providing service commensurate with the outlay for maintenance.

Mails can not be moved on long connecting lines of routes without suffering intolerable delays and multiplicity of handlings, rehandlings, rough usage, abrasion not experienced in transmission by rail.

Limitation of load and earning capacity and high mileage cost militate against operation of long routes or routes more than 80 miles in length. The long group or chain or through connecting routes must necessarily operate at a loss.

Questionable whether extending governmental aid toward increasing food production is properly a charge to be laid against Post Office Department appropriation. The same applies to improvement of public roads.

For the sake of experiment, a few motor-truck routes should be retained in operation to further test the possibility of promoting "collection and delivery of food from the producer to the consumer and the delivery of articles necessary to the production of such food to the producer." Association of this function with general mail movement should not be considered the matter of first importance.

It is feared that, for use of food producers, the postal rates are too high, the requirements as to packing and wrapping too exacting, the insurance and collect-on-delivery features too expensive and burdensome.

As means of providing facilities for business between producer and consumer, the routes in general have not shown great usefulness, but a few have developed sufficient importance to warrant retaining them for further trial.

I shall ask Senators to examine this report, as I shall not have time to direct attention to the clear and unequivocal findings covering the entire operations of the officials who conducted the experiments.

Senators will observe the criticisms made by the inspectors of the methods employed in this service. They state "that routes are conducted in competition with other established service and claiming revenues not actually earned." That is to say, in order to make a favorable showing those who were conducting this experiment claim for it revenues that were not actually earned. Under the original scheme first, second, and third class mail matter was not to be carried by the motor trucks, but in order, presumably, to swell the receipts and thus impose upon Congress, first, second, and third class mail matter was diverted from the railroads and other instrumentalities having contracts for carrying the same and conveyed by the motor-truck vehicles. The report shows that diverted mail was often carried but a short distance, "apparently to show postal revenue, and then discharged for further transportation by trains." Senators will observe that the inspectors in their report charge that the postage of fourth-class matter is comparatively a small part of "so-called revenue," and that the statistics of earnings submitted by the Fourth Assistant's office improperly include items of credit.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has come to my information, and I think it was stated before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, that in some instances, in order, apparently, to make a showing for this service, even first-class mail was taken off a mail train and put into a truck, driven a certain distance along the route, and eventually put back into the same train.

Mr. KING. I think that is shown in the testimony here in the record.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, that is hardly true. What occurred was this: For instance, where a train and truck started out from the same city, and the truck started out perhaps an hour or two earlier than did the train, mail was put on to the truck, taken part way down the line, and there put on to the railroad train that came along later, picking it up.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not necessarily the same train.

Mr. TOWNSEND. It was the same train that started out after the truck left the city, but mail was not taken off the train and put on the truck. It was only put on the train once, and that was after the truck had hauled it part way down the road.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then I am in error, I may say to the Senator from Utah, in stating that the mail was originally taken out of a train after it started from a railroad station, or the vicinity of one, and then eventually loaded off the train in order to reach its destination within a reasonable period; but the truck, I venture to say, was given credit for carrying that first-class mail, and then Congress was asked, upon such a showing as that, to appropriate more money.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Utah will yield to me for just a moment, I think it is proper that the Senator from New York should understand the facts accurately. What the Senator has stated was done for the reason that the delivery of mail to near-by villages should be facilitated and reach there much earlier on the truck than it would by waiting on the train schedule.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I did not quite understand the Senator's explanation.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is in error in his statement. Let me take, for an example, the case where mail was dispatched by truck from Birmingham, Ala., and an hour and a half or two hours later was put onto a train which left Birmingham somewhat later than did the truck, but the truck was given the credit for the earnings for the carriage of the mail between Birmingham and the point where it was put on the train. The mail, however, was not at all hastened in reaching its destination; it was merely hastened in leaving the post office, though not in the final delivery; but the truck was credited with the earnings for carrying that first-class mail between Birmingham and the point where it was transferred to the train.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts may be partially right in his correction, but the fact is that, while I do not entirely approve of what was done, the only reason that could be given in defense of this proposition was that the mail for intermediate points, at least, was facilitated by using these trucks instead of the trains, and that is the evidence in each case—in Birmingham, in New York, and out of Baltimore, also, unless I remember the testimony incorrectly.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, a little later on I want to point out some of the peculiarities of the methods which were used in conducting this experiment, not with any desire of disparaging the possible value of the experiment but to show that it was improperly, unwisely, and almost dishonestly conducted.

Mr. KING. I think the finding of the inspectors which I called attention to a moment ago supports the contention of the Senator from New York. The inspectors state that diverted mail is often carried only a short distance in transit, apparently to show postage revenue, and then discharged for further transportation by trains; and they further state that "pamphlet instructions to postmasters from Fourth Assistant directs them to send by motor-truck mail of all classes that can thereby be advanced in delivery or dispatch," both terms being used evidently with a purpose. It is obvious that in some respects the manner in which the experiments were conducted was violative of the statute, and it seems to have been the purpose to make a showing upon which a further demand could be made for increased appropriations for motor-truck service. The investigations of the inspectors seem to indicate a purpose upon the part of some officials conducting the experiments to fasten upon the Government as a permanent policy a scheme for motor-truck transportation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think there is no defense, if true, to some of the things with which the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General is charged by the committee appointed by the Postmaster General to investigate that matter.

The purpose of the motor-truck service, however, was to increase the facilities for the farmers living near the cities and towns to bring the products of their farms to market. Of course the effect of that would increase the farmers' profits and at the same time lower the cost of living to the man in town. Nothing but good could result from such a service economically conducted. I think there can possibly be no objection to the purpose of this experiment. It is a very laudable and proper one. It is the ardent hope of the committee that after a while the public highways shall be so improved that the service under consideration may increase to the extent that will prove inexpensive to the Government.

As to sending first, second, and third class mail by the motor truck, destined to points miles and miles away, for the purpose of showing the volume of business on the motor truck, if this were done to deceive the Congress and mislead the country, of course all right-thinking men will regard it as reprehensible; and when the matter was first called to the attention of the committee the members of the committee were quite as outspoken in their condemnation of such a practice as the Senator from Utah is severe in his condemnation. But I ought to state that Mr. Blakslee, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, denies that the records were padded or any intention on his part to deceive the Congress or the public.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. Does not the report which was submitted, and which I hold in my hand, convict the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General of improper conduct and a violation of the letter and spirit of the law?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think on its face it does. I was not present when the committee heard the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General in his explanation of the report. He was called before the committee to answer the charges made by the inspectors, and I have not had an opportunity, having been out of the city for some days on official business, to read his statement of the case or defense of the charges. But there are certain charges made in the report which I do not think he can explain or effectively defend unless they are untrue.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, he will see that the Postmaster General approves of the findings and conclusions submitted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that the Postmaster General approved it. Of course, the Postmaster General is only indirectly involved in this controversy. I have not seen his report, but I do know that Mr. Blakslee denied some of the statements contained in the report made by the inspectors and denied emphatically the conclusions reached by them. As I have said heretofore, Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to read Mr. Blakslee's statement or to go carefully into the report of the inspectors. The purpose of my rising was to say that the Post Office Department in establishing the rural motor-truck service is to be commended and is heartily approved by me. If it can be made profitable to the farmers of this country and beneficial to the consumers of farm products living in the cities, without imposing a burden on the taxpayers, I think that every encouragement should be given the enterprise, and I hope that the Post Office Department will be able to so perfect the system as to win the approval of everybody.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in reply to the statement made by the Senator, permit me to say that an examination of the report submitted by the inspectors justifies the findings and conclusions submitted by them. The statement of the Senator to the effect that, if it can be made profitable to the agriculturists of the country and beneficial to the consumers, to establish a system of motor-truck transportation, it should be encouraged, providing no "burden is imposed upon the taxpayers," may mean very much and may possess but slight significance. The Senator, of course, knows that the most impractical and costly schemes are often enthusiastically indorsed by their advocates and by thoughtless, hysterical supporters. It is easy to so garnish and bedeck the most vicious, squalid, and destructively extravagant scheme as that wise and practical men are often deceived. Every plan that seeks a perversion of the powers of the Government has been backed by pleas akin to those just suggested by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi. The poisoned cup so often placed before us is filled with beautiful colored distillations which appear more beautiful than the pure sparkling stream. The most tyrannous of despotisms, the most benumbing and dangerous bureaucracies and paternalisms, are justified and applauded upon the theory of service to the people. This Republic is a striking example of what a democracy can accomplish for the economic and industrial welfare and the political liberty and progress of a people. Though the states of Europe are inhabited by millions, are compact, and in many instances the difficulties of constructing and developing transportation instrumentalities are reduced to a minimum because of the topography and other natural conditions, nevertheless we have the best and cheapest transportation facilities in the world. I am referring to conditions immediately before we entered the war. The state socialisms and the autocratic forms of government of Europe have not given to the people the advantages in commerce, in trade, in industrial development, in economic advancement, that have been enjoyed in this Republic. And yet there are those who would fasten upon this free people the discredited, archaic, and tyrannous policies and systems of the old world. Of course, everyone familiar with the work of the Federal Government knows that its undertakings and accomplishments, large or small, involve an expense entirely disproportionate to the results achieved. If it is profitable and beneficial to establish systems of motor-truck transportation in our country, then individuals and private enterprise will work out comprehensive and satisfactory plans.

The American business man is always alert and ready for an investment that promises a reasonable reward. As a result we find railroads, steam and electric, threading the States of the Union. In many localities express companies are in operation. In many States passengers and freight are carried by privately owned and operated vehicle systems of transportation. In some instances vehicles are drawn by horses, and in other instances motor cars and trucks are utilized. If there is a field for motor-truck transportation, private enterprise will enter it. Such a field, under our form of government, is for private enterprise and not for the Government.

Does it not occur to Senators that we are confronted by a somewhat remarkable condition? We are asked to appropriate large sums for the purpose of establishing a motor-truck transportation system; the experiments conducted by the Government prove it to be expensive and impractical and, to some extent, an encroachment upon the field covered by steam and electric railroad systems. The report of the inspectors, as I have stated, shows that express companies, electric lines, railroads, and privately owned autotrucks "furnish cheaper transportation for produce with less exacting requirements than this projected system." The fact that the Government is in possession of most of the steam railroads of the United States and is operating them at a loss should occasion concern to all thoughtful persons. We have already appropriated $500,000,000 which the railroads have absorbed, and are now required to appropriate $750,000,000 more to aid in operations for the coming year. This sum, enormous as it is, we are told is imperatively required, and that the railroads will cease to properly function unless it is forthwith obtained. The railroad rates have been increased from 25 to 400 per cent. Notwithstanding these great increases in freight and passenger rates, the railroads were operated at a loss of more than $200,000,000 for the past year. We are now asked to further diminish the freight carried by railroads, notwithstanding they are operating at a loss under Government control, the loss to be met from the Public Treasury. We have heard rather lurid stories of the great economies brought about in railroad operation since the Government assumed control. They are proving to be fairy tales. The situation of the railroads to-day incontestably demonstrates that governmental operation has been as extravagant, costly, and inefficient as is the handling of most other business undertakings and enterprises by the General Government. Its few months' control of the telephone systems of our country has wrought the same disastrous results. It has produced confusion, disorder, and chaos, disturbed business, affected the value of securities, and created a huge deficit for which the Government will be held responsible. Its control of the telegraph systems has been equally inefficient and destructive. We see some of the costly results of governmental control when we look into the work of Government agencies during the war through which we have just passed.

I need only to invite attention to the work of the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation and to the aircraft production and to the work of the Ordnance Department to prove the inefficient, costly, and intolerable business methods under which the Government conducts its business. Governmental control and operation are synonymous with waste, extravagance, and inefficiency, and often disorder and chaos. It is impossible in a republic and among a free people to have efficient Federal ownership and control of those matters which are manifestly within the field of private endeavor. A despotism rather than a republic is better calculated to secure efficient operation and control, not only of public utilities but of business undertakings which are regarded as legitimately and exclusively of a private character. I believe that under our form of government it is not the province of the Federal Government to engage in transportation. In this statement I am referring to the question of policy rather than that of power.

It is clear to even the blind that back of the appropriation which is now sought by this bill there exists a design to increase the powers and prerogatives and responsibilities of the Post Office Department, to multiply by thousands the employees of that department, and to increase its expenditures by millions of dollars annually.

I want to express my disapproval of the efforts which are being made by certain officials of the Government to expand the powers and jurisdiction of the Post Office Department. There are officials within it who are determined to have the Government acquire and operate the telegraph, telephone, and cable systems and place them under the control of the Post Office Department. There are still others who desire that the Government shall take over, own, and operate through the Post Office Department all express companies and establish motor-truck transportation systems ramifying all parts of the United States. Of course, this is in line with the plan to convert the Federal Government into a vast paternalism, an autocratic socialistic state. This plan would culminate in the destruction of private enterprise and private business and would lay upon the American people a heavy hand that would destroy private initiative, individual ambition, and reduce the people to the dead level of a monotonous and decadent mediocrity. The American people, instead of being a virile, puissant, mighty force for progress and civilization, would subside into a stagnant pool, giving off foul and poisonous exhalations.

I invite the attention of the Senators, and particularly the Senator from Mississippi, to the railroad situation in our country to-day. A few years ago there was an era of railroad building and development. Thousands of miles of steam railroads were annually constructed. Within a few years electric railroads were built in most of the States of the Union. Energetic, pushing Americans linked the cities and towns and States with electric railroads which proved of immense advantage and importance to the people. In many instances they came in competition with the steam roads, resulting in a reduction of freight and passenger rates. They brought the towns and the rural districts to the cities and linked remote parts of States with the congested centers of population. They enabled the farmers to transport their products to market, and in various ways contributed to the happiness and material welfare of the people. But the day of railroad building seems to have come to a close. Men who were willing to invest and construct additional steam and electric roads hesitate. With the hampering restrictions of States and political subdivisions within States, and the unreasonable attitude of the Federal Government toward railroads, together with the menacing attitude of those who demand Government ownership of railroads, we can not expect that additional roads will be constructed. Trust companies who hold the savings of the rich and the poor, as well as those who have means for investment, would hardly be warranted in loaning their money to construct new railroads under present conditions. There is no one thing that would conduce as much toward the revival of business as a clear-cut announcement upon the part of the Government of a wise and rational policy with respect to railroads, telegraph and telephone lines, and a fair and proper method of dealing with matters of interstate commerce. Such a course would result in the organization of new railroad companies or the extension of existing systems. Interurban roads would be increased. Transportation charges would be cheapened and the demand for labor increased.

I did not intend to discuss the railroad question, but was diverted by the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi; but before leaving the subject I wish to invite attention to a letter received by me sometime ago which throws light upon one angle of the question of motor-truck transportation. I express no opinion upon the merits or facts of the case stated by him. The letter was written by an enterprising American who has done much toward building electric railroads. Referring to my opposition to appropriations to establish motor-truck transportation by the Government, he says:

> The cities and counties of California, which have spent tremendous sums of money on good roads within the past few years, are now finding to their dismay the costs of maintaining these roads and are further discovering that the greatest destructive agency in proportion to mileage is a heavily loaded motor truck, and the second most destructive agency is the large jitney bus, which is also an impediment to the use of the road by the ordinary automobile. It will take but a few years more to demonstrate that the furnishing of a free roadbed to motor trucks and jitneys in competition with the electric roads, which have to furnish either their own private rights of way * * * or pay all the paving included within the area bounded by lines 2 feet on the outermost side of their tracks, including maintenance, is one of the most expensive forms of securing additional transportation that the public has indulged in.
> If the public furnished the free rights of way, roadbed and structures thereon, rails, ties, bridges, etc., to the electric lines, you will readily appreciate what an enormous extension of interurban facilities would be possible and how much greater in value to the public the transportation would be in comparison with any motor truck or jitney line. I do not mean that such a thing is possible, but such a policy would be parallel in a very large degree with that now pursued with reference to motor trucks and jitneys.
> The present policy has resulted in embarrassing financially the electric roads of this State. It has been the chief factor in preventing almost absolutely extensions for passenger business alone during the past four or five years.

While statistics I have here are not complete, I think it safe to say that the new State highways, with the bridges involved, are costing in excess of $18,000 per mile. The wider streets of the cities, ranging from 40 to 60 feet, are costing for paving from $40,000 to $60,000 per mile.

The figures show that the cost of maintenance of paved public highways in Los Angeles County last year per mile of roadway was greater than the cost of maintaining tracks and roadway per mile of the Pacific Electric.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Utah to give his approval to that suggestion? Would the Senator, in the interest of street railways, deny the public highways to the people living in the country over which to run their motor trucks or their automobiles?

Mr. KING. Certainly not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the United States Government could furnish the farmers of this country transportation for their truck products at a lower cost, and without cost to the taxpayers, would the Senator deny them that facility to market their produce, in order to build up business for the electric railroad lines?

Mr. KING. Answering the Senator's suggestions, I want to state that in my opinion the Post Office Department can not furnish transportation for field and farm and make it a self-sustaining undertaking. The inspectors' report to which I have called attention conclusively establishes that fact. I concede that a few routes might be selected by the Post Office Department which would show for the time being no loss and perhaps a slight profit; but the Senator must take into consideration what the final result of the inauguration of this system of motor-truck transportation would be. If a few selected routes proved profitable, extensions would be made in all directions. The same influences would soon be at work that we discover in successful operation when river and harbor bills and post-office and public-building bills are being prepared. There would be logrolling and importunities and schemes of all sorts and kinds to secure the establishment of transportation routes. If a route was laid out in one precinct, another precinct would demand it, and the adjacent county would insist upon it, and surrounding counties would demad the extension of the route or the establishment of other routes within their borders.

Congressmen would be petitioned for the establishment of motor-truck routes within all parts of their districts, political influence would be brought to bear, men who wanted positions would inaugurate campaigns for the establishment of routes, until finally millions of dollars would be called for and tens of millions of dollars would be expended. But this is not the end of the ugly picture; new bureaus, agencies, and instrumentalities would be required, thousands of trucks would be purchased, supply depots would be needed, repair shops by the hundreds would be erected, and thousands of additional employees would be required; and these, in time, whether drivers or collectors of freight and produce, or keepers of the depots and stations where the same would be housed or received, would be protected by the civil service, and they, in turn, with the hundreds of thousands of others who are in the Government service, would demand civil pensions for which the people would be taxed. And, of course, to make a showing rates would temporarily be reduced to destroy any competition resulting from the operation of transportation companies by private individuals. This, together with the general incompetency of the Government in its administrative affairs, would inevitably lead to enormous deficits. Private corporations or individuals would build no further railroads nor establish transportation companies in competition with the Government. The plan would drive out of business existing transportation companies and would prevent the extension of the lines and plans of existing companies or the organization of additional ones. If the Government can furnish transportation, to use the language of the Senator, for the truck products of the farmers and make it a self-sustaining proposition, then unquestionably private individuals could do the same thing and make a profit; and, as I stated a few moments ago, the enterprise and genius of American people lead them into any and all legitimate enterprises where there is promise of profit or reward.

Let me mention another question that would arise if the Government should inaugurate this system. The highways of the country would be more or less injured by the operation of the Government trucks, and the cities, counties, and States would demand enormous appropriations from the Government for the repair of the same. Buildings would be necessary to care for the products transported by the Government trucks. These would need caretakers, insurance, and protection, and this would call for additional employees.

Mr. President, the plan is unwise and inexpedient. Of course, it is in line with the paternalism and bureaucratic method so popular in executive departments and in certain sections of our country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask the Senator if the Post Office Department should be able to furnish this transportation for the products of the truck farmer and make it a self-sustaining enterprise, would the Senator deny the Government that privilege of serving the people in order to build up business for electric railroad lines?

Mr. KING. I think I have sufficiently answered the question just submitted by the Senator, but I will add that, in my opinion, the department will not be able to furnish transportation and make it a self-sustaining enterprise. Of course, I would not, nor would any Senator, deprive the Government of any power which it possesses merely for the purpose of aiding the business of an electric railroad line. I am frank to say, however, that I should be glad to see more railroads, both steam and electric, constructed by corporations and individuals in our country. Their construction would give employment to thousands of men, and facilities for transportation of the products of the farmers and manufacturers and of all of our people would be multiplied. I welcome every effort to secure additional and cheaper transportation for the American people. What I attempted to show was that by unwise legislation, by the assumption of power by the Federal Government not possessed by it, transportation rates are increased and the instrumentalities of transportation fail to keep pace with the growing demands of commerce. Wise legislation by the States and by the Federal Government will encourage the construction of additional transportation systems. The enactment of laws by which the Federal Government enters the transportation field will in my opinion prove disadvantageous to the interests of the people. Conceding the power of the General Government to engage in the transportation business, I insist that such action would be unwise and in the end it would prove harmful to the people. Under our form of Government it is not the legitimate function of the Federal Government to build and operate railroads and engage in the transportation of commerce.

Mr. VARDAMAN. My friend ought to know that that is being done. It may be that it is an improper function for the General Government to perform, but, as a matter of fact, the Government is performing that function.

Mr. KING. I admit that as a war measure the Federal Government took over most of the railroad systems of the United States and is still operating them. This is being done under the war power of the Government. There are many who question the wisdom and expediency of the act. I think, however, most persons will concede that under the war powers of the Federal Government it was authorized to seize and operate the railroads. I am persuaded, however, that all fair-minded persons will reach the conclusion that the control by the Government of the railroads has not been an unqualified success. Notwithstanding the enormous receipts resulting from the immense tonnage carried for the Government, as well as from the increased freight and passenger rates, the cost of operating the railroads was increased more than a billion dollars for the year, and the Government is called upon to meet a large deficit.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if it will not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask him if this provision of the bill does not involve—and if that is not substantially all it does involve—a proposed extension of the parcel-post service, the effect of which would be to promote direct dealings between the producer of farm products and the consumer? That would be the effect, but it is an extension, practically, is it not, of the parcel-post service, already in existence and operation?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I realize that the power of Congress to establish post offices and post roads is expressly granted by the Constitution. It is contended by able lawyers that under this grant of power the Government may establish parcel-post service as a branch of the Postal Service. But I submit that there must be some limitations upon this grant of power. I can not believe that Congress would be authorized to convert the Postal System into a huge transportation enterprise. Certainly it will not be contended that the framers of the Federal Constitution contemplated that the authorization to establish post offices and post roads conferred an unlimited and unrestricted grant of power upon the Federal Government to construct railroads and various other instrumentalities of transportation and then to engage in all forms of transportation. Will Senators contend that the authority to establish a post office confers the power to create a mercantile establishment and a manufacturing plant and to engage in all forms of trade and commerce? Jefferson suggested that the establishment of post roads might mean the selection of roads already established in the various States rather than the building of additional ones. Whether the suggestion is of importance or not, manifestly it can not be successfully maintained that the power to establish a post road authorizes the General Government to engage in all forms of transportation and commerce. I submit there must be some point beyond which the Federal Government may not go in its legislation, based upon the clause of the Constitution which I have just referred to. If under the guise of transporting mail it constructs railroads it would seem to follow logically that it should have the power to make the enterprise financially successful. To accomplish this result it might be necessary for the Government to acquire and operate mines and smelters in order that there might be tonnage for its cars. Factories and all other enterprises which promised commerce could thus be developed and conducted in order that freight might be provided for the railroad system so owned and operated by the Government. It would certainly be a loose and latitudinarian, if not absurd, construction to place upon the Constitution to argue that the postal clause of the Constitution would authorize all such undertakings.

I do not think the Senator from Florida is quite accurate in intimating that the establishment of motor-truck transportation is merely an extension of the parcel-post service; but if it be an extension, then it would be no more than an extension to authorize the operation by the Post Office Department of motor trucks in all parts of the land to carry commodities of every form and the products of the factories and the mines and the fields. It would only be an "extension" of the system for the Government to acquire rights of way, to construct railroads, build warehouses, employ hundreds of thousands of men to operate the same, and to drive into bankruptcy the railroads owned by private individuals and corporations, and thus take charge of the entire carrying trade and business of the Nation. I leave it to the able Senator from Florida and others who have the responsibility of passing upon these questions to determine whether there is no limitation upon the power of the Federal Government when it deals with "commerce among the States." I submit, with due deference to the views of others and to the expressions of learned judges of the land, that the establishment of "post roads" or the "regulation of commerce among the States" is vastly different from the building of roads and the construction of railroad systems for the purpose of transporting the commodities and products of the people and for the purpose of competing with individuals in the ordinary lines of business and in the fields of trade and commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has alluded to and I hope he will enlarge on the distinction between the powers of the Federal Government. Congress has a right to regulate interstate commerce, which might include motor-truck transportation to enable market gardeners and others to distribute their products. Will the Senator give the Senate his views on the distinction between regulating commerce and engaging in commerce itself? Is not the furnishing of transportation merely one of the forms of commerce? There is a distinction, it seems to me, that always ought to be kept in mind. The Senator very briefly alluded to it, and I hope he will enlarge on it during his discussion of the subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not feel competent to answer the question of the Senator from Illinois or make any worthy contribution toward the discussion of this important subject. However, I shall submit a few observations which I hope will prove more or less relevant. Perhaps the commerce clause of the Constitution has been the subject of as much controversy as any one provision of that instrument. At any rate, it has produced many learned discussions and yielded a multitude of able opinions. One of the most important decisions rendered in the early days of the Republic was in the famous Gibbons-Ogden case. Chief Justice Marshall in that remarkable opinion did much toward shaping the course of the Federal Government. No decision since then has successfully challenged the principles therein announced or the conclusions reached. Under the commerce clause Congress has the power to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." The power of Congress, as stated, is regulatory. It does not authorize the creation of commerce or give authority to the Federal Government to embark upon enterprises and undertakings for the production of the articles of commerce. We all know that the principal reason that prompted the Constitutional Convention to adopt the commerce clause grew out of the abuses connected with the insignificant in amount but nevertheless to the colonists important trade between them. The evils of internal barriers erected by the Colonies, and which operated to restrict trade and commerce, were so apparent that the delegates to the Constitutional Convention were willing to surrender to the Federal Government the power to "regulate commerce among the various States." They understood, as was declared in the Gibbons-Ogden case, that commerce consists of "intercourse and traffic."

I think, however, the interpretation placed by the courts upon this important clause has extended its meaning and scope beyond that within the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution.

As I recall Madison's statement, it was to the effect that the power granted to the Federal Government under the commerce clause "was intended as a negative and preventive provision against injustice in the States themselves, rather than as a power to be used for the positive purposes of the General Government." I think the decisions of the Supreme Court support this statement. The power of regulation to be exercised by the Federal Government is entirely different from the building and operation of railroads and other instrumentalities of transportation. Certainly it was not designed that the Federal Government under the guise of "regulation" should invade the internal affairs of the States or engage in business undertakings which were carried on by individuals and corporations within the States and were subject to the police power and control of the States.

Mr. Tucker, in his admirable work on the Constitution, in discussing the commerce clause states in effect that Congress has the power to regulate traffic in things in transitu but not the things themselves. The case of Hammer against Dagenhart, recently decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, construed the child-labor law, and the opinion of the majority of the court, as I recall it, supports the views which I have briefly submitted, and declares that the manufacture of goods is not commerce, nor does the fact that they were afterwards shipped in interstate commerce make their production a part of that commerce and subject to the control of Congress.

It is a matter with which we are all familiar that the colonists were jealous to maintain the rights and sovereign powers of their respective Commonwealths. It was only the menacing dangers surrounding them which induced them to form the Federal Union. They clearly manifested a purpose to limit the powers of the Federal Government and to reserve to the States and to the people, respectively, all the powers not delegated to the former.

They were not paternalistic; they did not believe in State socialism or in bureaucratic government; they did not intend that the Federal Government should become a vast Frankenstein or that its powers should be perverted to enable it to enter into competitive business with the people of the various States. They never dreamed of the Government which they created engaging in commerce or producing articles of commerce to be handled through the channels of trade and commerce. It is true the case of McCulloch against Maryland holds that corporations may be created for the purpose of carrying out some governmental purpose; and later it was held, in Luxton v. North River Bridge Co. (153 U. S.), that Congress may create corporations as appropriate means of executing the powers of government, and that therefore it could authorize the creation of a corporation for the construction of a bridge over a navigable stream.

President Buchanan considered that under the war-making power military roads could be constructed by the Government through the Territories, and later, as Senators will remember, corporations were authorized for the construction of the Pacific system of railroads. It is my recollection that this legislation was justified upon the ground of military necessity, or rather upon the ground that the Federal Government, under the war-making power, had the right to appropriate money or make land grants to aid in the construction of military roads through the Territories.

During Washington's administration Madison supported a bill authorizing the survey of a post road from Maine to Georgia. Of course, the Constitution is clear as to the power of Congress to construct post roads. In those early days transportation between the Colonies was well-nigh impossible because of the lack of roads. However, Jefferson made objections to Madison's views, contending that it would be "the entering wedge of enormous expenditures, boundless patronage by the Executive, a bottomless abyss of public money." He suggested the question as to whether the power to make post roads authorized the "construction" of roads rather than the "selection" of those already in existence.

During the administration of President Monroe the question of the power of the Federal Government to engage in internal improvements was a very vital one. Conflicting views were then entertained in regard to the powers of Congress to construct roads for any purpose unless, perhaps, under the war-making power for military needs.

Mr. Justice Bradley, in one of the Union Pacific Railroad cases—found, as I recall, in One hundred and twenty-seven United States—stated, in substance, that under the power to regulate commerce, as well as to establish post roads and for military purposes, the Federal Government was authorized to pass laws for the creation of corporations to construct the railroads in question. Mr. Tucker declares that that portion of the decision holding that Congress can build railroads under the commerce clause is dictum. I think there is no question but that the issues presented did not call for a decision as to the power of Congress under the commerce clause to authorize the construction of the Pacific railroad system.

There can be no question as to the power of Congress to authorize, or perhaps to build, a railroad for postal or military purposes. There is in my mind serious doubt as to the power of Congress to construct railroads under its authority to regulate commerce "among the several States" for the purpose of carrying the commerce of the people.

How far the courts will go in their interpretation of the commerce clause it is impossible to determine. They have held that all instrumentalities of commerce, physical or otherwise, are subject to regulation by the Federal Government, and that this power to regulate not only includes personal property and all forms of goods and merchandise that may be the subject of commerce but all persons who conduct commerce and the charges thereon and profits therefrom. This necessarily leads to the position that all corporations engaged in interstate commerce may be regulated by the Federal Government. And the decision in the Caminetti case subjects individuals to the regulating control of Congress. It is a tremendous power, and its extent becomes more apparent as the commerce between the various States increases and the business relations between the people become more intimate. However, I respectfully submit that the power to regulate commerce ought not to be construed to authorize the Federal Government to engage in commerce. If such power were granted and fully exercised, it is manifest that not only intrastate commerce but that which is interstate in character and which is the result of private or corporate effort could be destroyed. There could be no competition with the Government. There would not be "regulation" of commerce, but destruction of all instrumentalities of commerce not owned and controlled by the Government. Railroads, all forms of transportation, mines, mills, factories, indeed most producing property, real and personal, would be owned or controlled, and probably both, by the Government, and the people would be its employees. There would no longer be a Republic; the very form of our governmental structure would be changed, and our institutions, our economic and political life, would be submerged by a form of despotism or a condition of chaos and anarchy that might overwhelm or blot out the civilization of this Nation.

We all remember the centralization that was attempted when the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted. It was designed to strike down the States and aggrandize the Federal Government. Fortunately for the liberties of the American people, courageous judges declared that the States should be preserved, and that there should be no assumption of power by the General Government which would destroy the States or shackle the people of the States. The amendment was regarded as a reaffirmation of the "cardinal principles of Magna Charta as guaranteed as well by the national power against the action of the States as against its own action."

So I hope that the commerce clause will not be perverted and become the engine of oppression and destruction.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Any power that the Government has to own and operate ships, if it exists at all exists under this same clause, does it not?

Mr. KING. Is that the question of the Senator?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I would not want to answer that that is the only clause; but, speaking without opportunity for full reflection, I am inclined to think that the Senator is right.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator deny the power of the Federal Government to own and operate ships?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, what I have stated concerning railroads is applicable in a general way to the subject of marine transportation. I know that many able lawyers contend that the General Government may build, purchase, and operate ships for commercial purposes; that the Government may engage in the carrying trade not only between ports of the United States but between our country and foreign nations. How far the courts would go in upholding legislation, if it should be enacted, which has these objects in view I can not state. I can only repeat that there must be some limitation upon the commerce clause of the Constitution. It was not intended to confer upon the Federal Government unrestricted authority to become a gigantic business corporation. Of course, the Government can own and operate ships for purely governmental purposes. It can employ them in the transportation of troops and for military and naval purposes. Indeed, there are many legitimate purposes for which ships may be used by the Government, but, speaking in a general way, and without full opportunity for such reflection as is necessary to reach a matured judgment, I would say that the Federal Government would have difficulty in defending its course if it should engage in all forms of commerce upon land and upon sea.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, of course, the Senator understands that my question was directed to the question of power and not to the question of policy.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] rose first. I yield to him, and then I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I merely wanted to make the suggestion that if there is anybody who thinks that the Federal Government does have power to operate ships, it would be interesting to have him indicate under what clause of the Constitution the power may be found.

Mr. KING. Yes; I should be very glad to be advised in respect to that. I was thinking hurriedly, as the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin was propounding his inquiry, and endeavoring to ascertain what particular provision of the Constitution conferred upon the Federal Government the power to acquire and operate transportation systems for the purpose of carrying the trade and commerce of the peoples of this and other lands.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I am free to say that in my opinion the interstate-commerce clause does warrant it. In my opinion the Supreme Court in many expressions has indicated that the power exists, and I believe it does exist.

Mr. KING. I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the greater part of those have been resolved under the war powers. The interpretation of war powers in this Chamber has no limitation that I know of, unless it be that in the executive department; and that has evidently gone beyond the United States, and extended over the world.

Mr. KING. I suggest to my friend from Illinois that I do not think the position which has been taken is quite as extreme as suggested. I think Senators have gone to the extent of contending that the war powers would permit Congress to do whatever it conceived to be necessary for the public defense, if not prohibited by or forbidden in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. And ships have been one of the necessary incidents to the execution of those powers, and can be justified there.

Mr. KING. Oh, yes. I grant that when we are in war the Federal Government has the right to seize ships, and railroads, and all other instrumentalities used in transportation, as well as all forms of private property needed by it. Its power is beyond question to own and operate ships and railroads for the purpose of carrying on war, either defensively or offensively.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, that, however, does not relate to the peace powers or to the interstate-commerce powers.

Mr. KING. Exactly.

Mr. SHERMAN. When peace shall be concluded all such powers would cease, and Congress would return to the ordinary limitations that are found in the Constitution during the peace period.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what you are going to do with the six months which the law provides the railroads shall be held after peace has been declared?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is in the clouds, or, as the law books put it, in nubibus. It reposes, like parliamentary rules, in the cerebral activity of the Presiding Officer or in the Executive. There is no limitation because there happens to be a six months' period. The six months' period is a time extended over the actual war condition, but still covering war requirements, and is intended to effect the bridging of the passage from peace to war periods. That is all these limitations are for.

Mr. KING. Oh, Mr. President, a reasonable construction, of course, must be placed upon all statutes; the Federal Government would therefore have a reasonable time within which to restore property seized by it for war purposes, or rather to aid it in carrying on the war. It would be required to pay compensation for the use of such property, or for its destruction, if such occurred.

It could not, however, invoke the war power under which it seized property as a justification for its retention and continued use for general transportation purposes. If that were true, whenever the Government seized property in time of war it could continue to use the same indefinitely and for purposes other than governmental.

Mr. KENYON. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator has finished discussing the report, I wish to say that Mr. Blakslee, who is the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General and has a good deal to do with this motor-truck proposition, when before the Committee on Education and Labor yesterday, referring to this appropriation of $300,000 in this bill, said it was utterly useless, that in a former bill the same amount, I think, had been appropriated to experiment and determine whether the principle was wise or not; that that experiment had been carried out and that it had proved a wise experiment; that they did not need $300,000 for any further experiment to determine the principle; that if any appropriation was made it should be the sum of $8,000,000 in order to carry out the experiment that had already proved a success. Mr. Blakslee was very enthusiastic about the ability to use the motor trucks. We have some 22,000 of them, he said, left by salvage from the war and possibly more across the sea, and he said they could be used, and if they were used it would give employment to men and also be a splendid method of their disposal; but he said this appropriation of $300,000 would amount to nothing; that it would be absolutely useless; that the appropriation should be $8,000,000 or nothing.

Mr. KING. Did he state that $8,000,000 would be all that would be required?

Mr. KENYON. No; but that $8,000,000 would reach into large sections of the country, and he instanced some of the work that had been done even on the edge of Washington, where a community center——

Mr. KING. Of course——

Mr. KENYON. May I just state, as it is rather interesting, I think, that a schoolhouse was designated as a community center and made a postal station? Out in the country schoolhouses are to be made community centers and postal stations. The farmers bring their products to the schoolhouse in the country and the truck brings them into the community center in the city on the edge of Washington. The people are buying these things and doing business, he said, in the sum of $500 a day, the consumers getting what they have to buy cheaper than in the market and the farmer getting more for his product; that that idea may be feasible to be worked out through the entire country; that it will take a great deal more than $8,000,000, but that would be a fair start.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator sees that any scheme of that kind would mean, first, the employment of a large number of men. They would be put under the civil service. It would mean the purchase of thousands of motor trucks. It would mean, of course, the establishment of shops in order to maintain the motor trucks, the purchase of depots, stations, warehouses, and the doing of all things necessary and incidental to carrying on a nation-wide transportation system.

As I have already shown, the civil service would be extended to the thousands of employees who would be required, and the retirement or pension system would mean, of course, additional burdens upon the country. It would mean, of course, contests for the establishment of routes. This would lead to political activity and all sorts of local intrigues and campaigns. It would become a political matter. It would be made the subject of constant logrolling, if I may be permitted the expression. Demands would be made in every part of the country, and the scheme would be the linking together of all the towns and cities and counties in all the States. It would mean not $8,000,000 or $80,000,000, but hundreds of millions. It is impossible to predict what the end of the scheme would be or the proportions which it would assume.

Mr. KENYON. I am not arguing against the position of the Senator; I have an open mind upon it; but I think the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has a wonderful vision in the use of these trucks which he now asks to do this work, and the argument that it will give employment to more men is one of the arguments he cites in favor of it, especially in the present condition as to unemployment.

Mr. KING. I have not any doubt in the world that every faddist in the country will be here making some suggestion as to how the Federal Government can furnish employment to individuals and what legislation should be enacted.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator really feel that that question in the next few months will become rather a serious question and one which may challenge the attention of Congress? If we can appropriate $100,000,000 to take care of people in Europe, we may be called upon to appropriate money to take care of people at home by giving them work.

Mr. KING. I agree with the Senator that it may become a matter of very great importance, and I am in favor of some rational and proper legislation that will meet in a comprehensive way the abnormal conditions created by the war.

Mr. KENYON. I think it is hardly fair to say that people who raise that question and want to have it considered are faddists. It is a very serious situation in this country and is becoming more so every week.

Mr. KING. I did not use the word by way of criticism of those who were submitting practical and rational plans for affirmative action upon the part of the Federal Government, but the Senator, as a man of affairs, as a sound statesman, and as one familiar with the various schemes and plots that are presented for consideration almost every day, knows that it is a fact that many faddists are here, that fantastic and absurd schemes are submitted calling for enormous appropriations. He knows that selfish persons are endeavoring to promote unworthy objects which would be of no utility or advantage and would cost the Government millions and hundreds of millions of dollars.

I do not want to be misunderstood in my opposition to the appropriation sought for the installation of the motor-truck system of transportation. I am opposing the appropriation not only because I think there is no authority for the Federal Government to establish a general transportation system to carry all kinds of freight and commerce in competition with private transportation companies, but I am opposed to the plan because it will not cheapen rates or prove advantageous to the farmers or the people generally, and it will also prove inexpedient and wasteful, and in the end it will cost the people of the United States hundreds of millions of dollars. Moreover, it will prevent the extension of our present railroad instrumentalities and prohibit private enterprise from constructing additional railroads or establishing motor-truck or other systems to carry the products of the people.

The Senator from Mississippi wants transportation charges diminished and better means of transportation for the agriculturists and those who produce commodities for shipment. I share the desires of the distinguished Senator. His questions would imply a belief that the establishment of governmental control of transportation, or at least the entrance by the Government into the field of transportation, would best secure this result. From this view I dissent.

In my opinion the Government's control of the instrumentalities employed in transportation will seriously injure the American people. As I have stated, it will prevent further development of railroad systems by private enterprise, and the operation of transportation instrumentalities by the Government will result in greatly increased rates of transportation. It will not only prevent the construction of additional steam and interurban electric lines but it will probably destroy some that are now being operated.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the Senator, of course, realizes that the building of good roads throughout the country and the advent of the automobile have very seriously reduced the traffic on the interurban and electric lines. Of course, the Senator would not be opposed to Government—State and National—aid in building public highways if the effect should happen to be the reduction of freight carried on the steam railroads as well as the electric railroads. The Senator would not deny the country people the luxury of good roads because it might incidentally reduce the profits of the railroads and electric lines.

Mr. KING. I think I have made my position clear in respect to the matters suggested by the Senator's question, but I want to be understood as stating that I do not approve of the proposition, urged with so much vigor from many directions, that the Federal Government should build highways within the States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, I am in favor of the Government contributing to it.

Mr. KING. I appreciate, Mr. President, that my position is not the popular one. I have frequently voiced my opposition to the constant efforts to secure appropriations from the Federal Treasury to be used by the States to meet obligations necessarily incurred in the discharge of the responsibility resting upon them. So strong have become the centripetal forces in the Republic that many of the people are demanding that the General Government assume powers not granted to it, and which, if exercised, would destroy the States. There is a nation-wide propaganda which, if successful, will place the entire educational system of the States in the hands of Federal officials. An innocent-looking measure has been prepared which calls for a department of education, with a secretary at the head thereof having a place in the President's Cabinet.

Under the pretext of securing uniformity in our educational system and advancing knowledge and learning, pleas are being made for appropriations from the Federal Treasury to be expended under the proposed department of education within the various States. Already the movement has reached such proportions that many people are suggesting that the Federal Government take over the entire system of education and that the necessary funds for such purpose be obtained from the National Government. Education, it is claimed, is a national affair, not a local one, and being national it must become a charge upon the General Government. The Senator from Mississippi has just referred to the question of the Federal Government building highways. The measure before us carries $200,000,000 to be expended in the States, ostensibly to aid in the construction of post roads. I have received letters from various parts of the United States urging that all roads and highways be taken over by the General Government, to the end that a uniform system of highways might be laid out and established and that the States might be relieved of the heavy burden of constructing and maintaining their own highways. Some of the communications urge that the universal use of automobiles brings the States closer together and that large numbers of people travel from State to State with automobiles, and that the highways are therefore interstate and should be constructed and maintained by the Federal Government. I have no doubt insistent demands will be made that the States be relieved of the construction of highways. Similar demands are made that the Government take over the entire system of public health. And some have suggested that in view of the fact that the Federal Government has so many penal statutes, and that to enforce them a large force of detectives, marshals, and peace officers is required, that the Federal Government should take over the enforcement of all criminal statutes. There can be no doubt but what the prohibition amendment to the Constitution of the United States, under which the Federal Government assumes control of what was formerly a matter clearly within the police powers of the State, has contributed to the undermining of our dual form of government and affords a reason for the mournful predictions that the States will be destroyed and a strongly centralized government be erected upon their ruins.

I have been proud to follow the great leaders of Democracy, many of whom came from the State of Mississippi and from other Southern States. In my younger days, with enthusiasm, I followed the banner which they carried, believing that they represented the undying principles of Jefferson, and that the triumph of the Democratic faith was essential to the preservation of the Union and of republican institutions. On more than one occasion in recent years, and particularly during the past two or three years, I have at times felt that some Democratic leaders were not always true to the traditions of the past and the faith of the fathers. Events seem to have contributed to the development of a strongly centralized Government. The Federal Treasury has been used to undermine the political integrity of the people and to seduce them from the path of safety and of constitutional government. It is so easy to justify an invasion of the rights of the people or of the States if it is accomplished by a liberal Federal appropriation. States are beginning to shrink from the discharge of duties and functions appertaining to the same, and many of the people are becoming enervated and turn with longing eyes to Washington and to the Federal Treasury for appropriations and Government aid with respect to individual or purely local and domestic affairs. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] pointed out in his brilliant speech delivered a few moments ago the growing disposition of the people in all parts of our country to come with cap in hand and bow at the shrine of this new federalism, and graciously beseech its smiles and favors. And the people, who are the source of power, and the States, which are the agents of the people, seem willing to barter away their birthright and their liberties for a mess of pottage, for the crumbs that fall from the table of this new Dives, this rich, consolidated, and omnipotent Federal Government. The Federal Government under this new faith is to extend its all-powerful arms throughout the land and heal all infirmities.

Mr. President, this is a day of heresies, of pseudophilosophies, and of dangerous and destructive isms. These are times that "try men's souls" perhaps to as great an extent as when the immortal Paine contended for freedom in the Revolutionary days.

This hour calls for strong men who believe in this Republic and who are willing to make every sacrifice for its preservation. Some persons are talking of organizing a "Liberty Party," a party that will defend and preserve the Constitution of the United States against the insidious and destructive influences by which our Government is menaced. I can not believe, Mr. President, that the Democratic Party will fail in this supreme crisis. The spirit of Jefferson and Jackson will again descend upon the people, and the love of liberty will illumine our minds and take possession of the hearts of the people. The undying words of Lincoln will burn into the souls of the patriotic people of this Republic, and they will cry out again and again that this Republic, the Government handed down to us by the fathers, which is a "government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has been, I believe, chief justice of the supreme court of his State.

Mr. KING. Associate justice.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, of course, the Senator is familiar with the constitutional law and every other kind.

Mr. KING. I deny the soft impeachment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator deny for one moment that this bill is constitutional? Has it not been settled time and time again that it is constitutional?

Mr. KING. I suppose the Senator is referring to the provision regarding roads.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am.

Mr. KING. I stated a few moments ago in replying to the question asked by the Senator from Florida that the Federal Government has the right to establish post roads.

Mr. McKELLAR. If it has the power to do it, how can those of us who believe in the exercise of that power be regarded as opposed to the Constitution?

Mr. KING. I did not say—at least I did not intend to say—that those who believe in the Government establishing post roads were opposed to the Constitution or did not believe in a constitutional form of government. The discussion has taken a wider range than the question of the Senator from Tennessee would imply. The Senator from Mississippi propounded questions which went further, and proceeding along a natural line I adverted to the general tendency toward a centralized and paternalistic government and the destructive forces undermining local self-government.

I want to say further, in response to the Senator from Tennessee, that, under the guise of establishing post roads already established, I do not justify the Federal Government in taking hundreds of millions of dollars out of an empty Treasury—if I may be permitted an Irishism—for the purpose of building local highways which should be constructed by the States.

Mr. President, during the consideration of the pending measure I have upon several occasions called attention to the enormous amount carried by this bill and to the unprecedented appropriations made by this Congress. The present bill asks for more than $600,000,000, an amount so great as to excite the amazement of those who earnestly and patriotically address themselves to the fiscal affairs of our country, and particularly to the question of devising ways and means to supply the needed revenue therefor. And yet this sum covers the expenditures of but one department of the Government for a period of 12 months only. This sum, stupendous as it is, is but a small part of the aggregate amount which will be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920. I have heretofore called attention to what I conceive to be a lack of appreciation of the true financial condition of the Public Treasury and to the difficulties that will be encountered in raising sufficient revenue to meet the enormous appropriations now being made. I have repeatedly said that I believed we were not examining with sufficient care the appropriation bills which we are called upon to enact into law and are expending more than a proper regard for economy and a consideration of the Treasury warranted. In my opinion this Congress will be charged with extravagance and with the expenditure of millions that were not justified. Estimates from the various departments and from public officials are presented to the committees, and too often these estimates become the sole basis of committee recommendation and of congressional action; and even after estimates are submitted by various bureaus, departments, and Government officials supplementary and additional ones are quickly presented calling for millions and hundreds of millions of additional appropriations. I shall be charged with painful iteration and reiteration in challenging attention to this subject, but I have felt and still feel that many who are filling executive positions exhibit a selfishness and a disregard for the public interests that are reprehensible in the highest degree. There seem to be a mad race to see which bureau and department and governmental agency can obtain the largest appropriation.

Demands beyond all reason have been made for increases in the personnel of most of the departments, bureaus, and agencies of the Federal Government, and appeals and demands are daily and, indeed, hourly made to Congress for increases in salaries and compensations and for the extension of the activities and powers of executive agencies of the Government. The administration of the Federal Government is a costly undertaking. The war seems to have changed the vision of many charged with executive responsibility and caused them to lose sight of the practical, imperative, and immediate duties and responsibilities. They see in the war and in the situation now confronting us opportunities to exploit some fantastic theory and expand the scope and authority of the agency or department with which they are identified. Many wild and visionary schemes are suggested, some of which are destructive of the rights and powers of the States, and project the Federal Government into fields of activity not authorized by the Constitution of the United States. The most impracticable plans are proposed and enormous appropriations sought to aid in their execution. Suggestions that there are limitations upon the power of the Federal Government are regarded with derision, and those who submit the same are denounced as reactionaries and enemies in social progress.

There are many in the executive branches of the Government whose types are often discovered in private life. There are the "get-rich-quick" men, who seek to acquire wealth by some sort of legerdemain. The wise and prudent counsels of the past, which have brought business success and financial stability to individuals and to nations, are ignored. The slow paths of safety and prudence, leading to success, are disdained by men of this type. They promise riches to the credulous multitudes who look with wonder and undisguised admiration upon these new apostles of business and finance, and regard with ill-concealed contempt the paths pursued by the solid and substantial citizens who have given strength and vigor to the industrial and political fabric under which we live and the methods and policies lying at the base of the community and national economic and financial system. And so we find many clothed with governmental authority and many not in official position who seek a millennial era and "cure-all" for the evils to which governments and society are subject by some executive or legislative fiat or decree. But all of these visionary, impractical, and too often foolish and utopian plans and schemes rest upon the proposition that the Federal Government must take some vigorous action and expend millions of dollars wrung from the people by onerous tax laws. The idea of reforms and growth and progress by the application of natural laws is scouted. Arbitrary power, usurpation, and ruthless destruction of the individual and his rights are not only justified but approved. It is the same spirit that manifests itself in lynch law.

An individual who violates the law and whose crime is of such a character as to call for the death penalty under this spirit is quickly dragged to his death. His assailants are unable to wait for the slow operation of the law and refuse to conform to the established rules of organized society. And so we have those who are demanding not a government of the people, a government of growth and gradual but sure progress, a government which recognizes individual limitations and the lessons of history, but a government of officeholders and bureaucrats possessing unlimited power and given unlimited funds for expenditure. In other words, this spirit seeks not a government of law but of men—of officials and bureaus—which in such case would be a government of whims and caprices, an autocratic and repressive government. I protest against this new imperialism, this conference of power upon the National Government that belongs to the people and to the States, this establishment of an arbitrary, paternalistic Government, which stifles and destroys. This spirit is not new; it has manifested itself in various ages and in most nations.

There are those in the Government service to-day to whom the Constitution of the United States is a sealed book. There are many in the land to whom any form of government is obnoxious and others who are fanatical, bigoted, and intolerant. By drastic penal statutes they would control the habits and appetites of individuals and deny freedom of thought or liberty of action. Natural and normal conditions—conditions that flow from the sure evolution and progress of humanity—are regarded by some as so inapplicable as to demand destruction at the hands of the Government. These officials and others of like views would permit no individual liberty and can not conceive of any orderly growth and development. Miracles must be wrought, in their view, in the lives of individuals and nations. Traditions, environment, individual idiosyncrasies, immutable laws that lie at the base of human progress and development are disregarded. The reserved rights of the people, the powers conferred upon the States of the Union, and the limitations imposed upon the Federal Government are not only no admonition to the exercise of arbitrary power, but any claim that such rights and powers must be regarded and preserved is treated with contumely or anger. Lack of uniformity is regarded as detrimental to progress. This spirit at times seeks conformity to a crudely nebulous ideal type. The theory is that uniformity of thought and action, the conformation of conduct to arbitrary rule and standard, are productive of the best results and secure an ideal state of civilization. Tyrants and despots have sought such a course in all ages. Men and women were to think and act as the despot prescribed.

Laws and rescripts and minute regulations executed and enforced by unlimited and autocratic power it was believed would produce order and uniformity and progress. If an evil existed in the land, the decree of the sovereign was all that was required to remedy it. And so to-day we have in the executive departments of the Government and in colleges and elsewhere in our land a multitude of people who turn from the development of self, from the determination to individually grow and expand and to be differentiated from the mass around; they look to the Federal Government as the source of light and power. Instead of regarding themselves as being the fountain of power and life and growth and progress, the bestower of gifts upon government, they meekly look upon government as the source of power and authority, and seek guidance and direction from it and the bureaucracy which is being established.

Society is not a protoplasmic mass. We want no form of government that crushes individualism and reduces the units in the Government to a colloidal state. The chief glory of the American people is found in the fact that the men and the women of this land have developed to a high degree the spirit of self-initiative. The Nation is strong because the individuals of the Nation are strong. This Republic was founded by those who were protesting against this evil spirit just now seeking control in this land. Fiercely did our fathers contend for individual rights, the right of conscience, the right of free speech, the right of self-determination, and the right so essential to liberty—the right of local self-government. Their lives and their contests were against uniformity and homogeneity, against the lifeless protoplasmic condition that arbitrary power would create. And the differences in individuals led to differences in local governments; and so conditions made for variety and strength. I happen to have here an excerpt from the work of Mr. Collins, entitled "The Fourteenth Amendment and the States," which, I think, contains matter for serious consideration:

> Local self-government lies at the very foundation of a free country. The private affairs of a community should be regulated by that community without interference from the Federal Government so long as national interests are not directly affected. This ideal of local government is one of our most precious heritages from a heroic past. It is the school in which self-control, independence, and liberty are bred.
> This is not a question of bringing to life a dead State rights doctrine. It is dealing with a fundamental principle of political science. It is by no means a dead issue. On the contrary, no student of public affairs can fail to see that the question of the relation of State functions to Federal control is one of the most vital problems in our body politic. These United States cover a vast territory. From ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf may be found almost every variety of soil and climate. Physical environment and historical traditions have given rise to a diversity of custom and manner, thought, and speech. The occupations of the people of the different sections are characterized by fundamental and permanent differences. While we are essentially one people along broadly nationalistic lines, one meets with a variety of local conditions and habits of life as one journeys from Maine to California or from Key West to Oregon. This very diversity makes local government essential to justice. * * *
> The fourteenth amendment is a paternal measure. It is the introduction of the principle of paternalism among a people whose genius is foreign to such a political ideal. It has in it the germ which may retard their growth. Like all centralizing measures, it tends to reduce the life of the people to a dead level of uniformity. In such a vast territory as the United States, occupied by a people who for centuries have been accustomed to trust themselves in the regulation of their domestic affairs, the stimulus of local self-government is essential to their natural development. * * *

Harold J. Laski, in his admirable work entitled "The Problem of Sovereignty," discusses with clearness and profound thought some aspects of the question which I am in a casual and disconnected way presenting. He says:

* * * You can not make men complete by act of Congress. They have wills of their own that the statute does not form. Everywhere we have diversity, plurality. It seems, indeed, time to admit its existence. It is really difficult to understand what special merit attaches to unity. Germany points proudly to the complete absence of differences among her citizens. Contempt is openly expressed for a country like the United States, where diversity of opinion is most clearly apparent. * * *

In fact, there is real moral insufficiency in any theory of the State which impresses upon its numbers the need for any consistent uniformity of outlook. The fact that no one in Germany doubts her rightness in sinking, for example, the Lusitania, does not morally, or even politically, justify her position in that regard. It is simply evidence that in Germany to-day necessity has exacted the sacrifice of right to authority. Faith there is more urgent than thought. We prefer a country where the sovereignty is distributed, where the richness of the corporate lives is insurance against such sterility of outlook. The Austinian theory of sovereignty, ungenial enough even in its abstract presentation, would as a fact breed simple servility were it capable of practical application. There can be no servility in a State that divides its effective governance. The necessity of balancing interests, the need for combining opinions, results in a wealth of political thought such as no State where the real authority is single can attain. The price of liberty is exactly divergence of opinion on fundamental questions. (Pp. 272–274.)

Further on in the volume Mr. Laski says:

The growth of national government, with the consequent strengthening of its sovereign character, leads, as I have urged, to its increasing centralization. This is not true of America alone. * * * One of the resultant and fundamental problems Great Britain will have to face when its reconstruction comes is precisely this. Its local life will have to be made real. It will undergo revivification. Its units of local government will have to be made real. They will have to receive a sovereignty that is something more than an anemic reflex of the central power. An interest in local problems will have to be aroused not less keen and vivid than the interest in national problems. Nor is this less true of France. Her local group life has been sacrificed to the absorptiveness of Paris with the result that since the fall of Napoleon France has been striving to regain the local creativeness now stricken with impotence. The vigorous self-government of the modern German city derives from the at any rate partial admission by higher authority that its powers to be responsible must be complete. It was there remembered, as in England and France it has been forgotten, that the tissue of the civic parts changes more frequently than the tissue of the national whole. Since in the latter countries an adequate nutrition of final responsibility was not provided, the result has been in a real sense death from starvation.

I know well enough that nothing like this stage has been reached in the United States. Yet the difficulty is ominously near. No kind of working compromise has been reached between the States on the one hand and the Federal Government on the other. * * *

Speaking of the attempt to destroy the States in order to secure greater uniformity of conduct and to augment the powers of the Federal Government, Mr. Laski proceeds:

A typical instance is that of prohibition. Reformers in Maine do not see why they should suffer for the stupid inability of New York to control its liquor traffic. Congress, they say, should legislate for the Nation and prevent either the enactment of anomalies or the retention of so pathetic an ancestralism as a taste for beer. Now, I waive the whole question of whether Maine does in fact benefit from its more acute perception; reputable authority assures me that the contrary is the case. But the real question to which I want an adequate reply—more convincing than rhetorical statements of the case for prohibition—is whether America will not gain more from the slow self-struggle of New York to intelligence than from the irrigating imposition from without of a belief to which it has not been converted? I can not avoid the emphatic opinion that in this, as in other matters, nature is not saltatory. Politically we probably gain more from the slow and often painful erosion of prejudice by education than when we attempt its elimination by mere drastic methods. It is, of course, annoying for those of us who consider we have found the truth; but if we are to have democratic government we must bear with the inconvenience of democracy.

Mr. President, war seriously disturbs the normal functions of the State, and the local units or subdivisions of the State suffer more seriously. The tendency during war is toward centralization of power. That is why so often in the past the people have demanded a dictatorship when the flames of war envelop them. In the Civil War extraordinary powers were conferred upon the Executive of the Nation, and in this war great powers have been conferred upon the President of the United States. Millions of men were conscripted and placed under his control. Billions of dollars were taken from the people and given to him for expenditure. The power to cut off trade with foreign nations was placed in his hands. The means of transportation were taken from the people who owned them and intrusted to his hands. The powers of the President were regal in their extent, but with the termination of the war every effort should be made to return to the ways of peace at the earliest opportunity. The heavy hand of the Federal Government, exercised for the purpose of war, should be withdrawn from the States and from the people when the war ends. The extraordinary powers exercised by executive departments and branches of the Government should cease when the reason calling for their exercise ceases. Because war called for a centralization of power in the Federal Government, peace demands decentralization and an assumption by the States and the people of the powers belonging to them. We warred against an autocratic form of government; there must be no attempt to establish an arbitrary and autocratic form of government in this Republic. Germany sought to concentrate all power in the Kaiser—in the executive branch of the Government. It weakened the States, rendered more or less impotent the local governmental units, and sought to prevent the development of the individual. The State was supreme and the Kaiser was the supreme lord over all. All remedies for social, industrial, economic, or political ills emanated from the Crown. There was efficient government, but it was arbitrary and autocratic. To overthrow this autocracy which threatened the world we entered the war, and yet there are those within our land who seek to crush the individual, destroy the States, and erect a despotic federalism. The spirit of defeated autocracy seems to seek refuge in the heads of some foolish and unpatriotic Americans. Have we aided in exorcising the spirit of tyranny and bureaucracy and a baneful paralyzing paternalism from the central empires only that it might take possession of those who gloriously fought for humanity?

We are daily importuned to have the Federal Government enter upon plans which Germany devised and carried into execution. Those who now speak out for the States and for their maintenance and for the preservation of local self-government find unsympathetic auditors. If an Executive should now submit an address as Thomas Jefferson did when he delivered his first inaugural address, in 1801, and speak as he did, I apprehend that the reception would be less cordial than if some ephemeral, visionary plan were advocated which promised great financial rewards to the States and material advantages to the people. Permit me to quote what Jefferson did say upon the occasion mentioned:

The support of the State governments in all their rights, as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies, I deem (one of the) essential principles of our Government, and consequently (one) which ought to shape its administration.

Let me quote again from Jefferson. In a letter to Joseph Cabell, in 1816, he wrote:

What has destroyed the liberty and the rights of man in every government which has ever existed under the sun? The generalizing and concentrating all cares and powers into one body, no matter whether of the autocrats of Russia or France or of the aristocrats of a Venetian Senate.

And upon another occasion he said:

It is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution that good government is effected. Were not this great country already divided into States that division must be made, that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly and what it can so much better do than a distant authority. Every State again is divided into counties, each to take care of what lies within its local bounds; each county again into townships or wards, to manage minuter details; and every ward into farms, to be governed each by its individual proprietor. * * * It is by this partition of cares, descending in gradation from general to particular, that the mass of human affairs may be best managed for the good and prosperity of all.

Students of the life of Lincoln know that he found authority for his political creed in the writings of the immortal Jefferson. Sociology, as a science, was scarcely known in Jefferson's time and had not reached manhood's estate in Lincoln's day, and yet these great Americans knew human nature as few men ever did and understood the causes advancing or retarding humanity's progress. The precepts of Jefferson, whose political philosophy is sufficient for all time, should again and again be preached to our dull ears.

When a well-nigh irresistible current threatens to sweep the States into a destructive maelstrom of federalism there is need for strong arms and stout hearts. The creed of a new nationalism is illusory and deadly. The faith of the fathers is still the true faith, the vital, living force that will save the people and preserve the Republic. Even this new nationalism is differently interpreted, but perhaps its truest exponents are those who regard it as the prerogative and the function of the Federal Government to discharge all of the duties resting upon the States, and, in addition to its political powers, it is to bear the social and industrial burdens and activities now discharged by individuals and local communities. In this view we would all live and move and have our being within the influence and power of a mighty centralized Nation. States would be mere shells out of which all life had departed. They would be vanishing shadows reflecting scarcely the forms of once puissant States.

Mr. President, on a number of occasions during the past two years I have ventured to raise my voice against these centralizing forces, against the corroding influences which destroy the strong tissue of individualism and what should be the indestructible fabric of our State governments. I have felt that the preservation of this Republic, the vitalization of the American people by the spirit which the faith of the fathers inspires, would bring to this Nation greatness and power, and to the people under the flag unimpaired freedom, material progress, and spiritual and intellectual development. I have felt that the Father who inspired the Constitution and guided the destinies of this Republic would outstretch His arm and preserve this Nation from the perilous paths that lead to destruction. But I confess that at times I have experienced apprehensions and doubts as to the future when I have encountered the conflicting currents that drive with blinding force throughout the land. I still feel that the rising floods will ultimately dash in vain against this great temple of liberty resting upon the heights of the New World, and that out of the storm, world-wide now in its extent, there will come peace and calm, and this Nation will extend its healing wings to minister to the sorrows of the world. But now more than ever should patriotic Americans lift their voices in defense of individual liberty, the protection of the States, and the preservation of the Republic.

We need, in the language of Mr. John M. Harlan, not a "new nationalism, but rather a new statehood":

> We need no crusade for the enlargement of the powers of the Nation. * * * The great need of to-day is that the States should awaken to their duty to exercise all their rightful powers and functions under the Constitution, and that they should do for themselves everything to the doing of which these powers, when intelligently exercised, are adequate. We must magnify the importance of the State legislatures and the value of the State courts. * * * What is needed is not doctrinaire theorizing about the rights of the States, but the prompt performance by the States of their duties, the active and full use of the powers and functions of the States toward solving the questions that now crowd upon the American people for solution. * * *
> In the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland it has lately been proposed to unload much of the work now being done by the Imperial Government upon local parliaments, first in Ireland and later probably in Scotland, Wales, and England. Careful thinkers, however they may differ as to the details of the pending home rule bill for Ireland, agree that the underlying principle of this process of devolution, when fully carried out, will greatly strengthen the United Kingdom and the British Empire because of the fuller and more wholesome development of each of the four constituent parts of the United Kingdom and the liberation of the Parliament at Westminster for the larger questions affecting the Empire as a whole. If in those small but thickly populated islands of Great Britain and Ireland the wisest men think that the development of strong local parliaments for each of the four constituents—England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland—is essential to the best and largest development of the United Kingdom as a whole, what can be said as to the very opposite tendency which in recent years has been permitted to go unchecked in this continental Republic, covering an area equal to all of Europe except Russia, and with a population soon probably to equal that of Great Britain, Ireland, France, and Germany combined? Fortunate from the very beginning in having separate State governments with clearly defined areas of activity, we have since the Civil War, and especially during the last 20 years, permitted the State governments to become weaker and weaker and our regard for their functions to become less and less. The time has come to reverse that process if along with a national authority strong enough to preserve, promote, and protect us in all our common interests we are to continue to enjoy local self-government.
> In all the States we must do what Henry Clay was wont to do for old Kentucky. We must foster a strong and wholesome State pride. * * *

Judge Henry Wade Rogers, in his thoughtful work entitled "The Constitution and the New Federalism," has admonished us of the dangers of the centralizing forces of the hour. He states:

> Once the question was whether the States would destroy the National Government. Now the question seems to be whether the National Government shall be permitted to destroy the States. It was the fear that that question might sometimes arise which led Samuel Adams and John Hancock in Massachusetts, George Clinton in New York, and Patrick Henry in Virginia to withhold for so long their assent to the ratification of the Constitution. But under the Constitution the States are as indestructible as the Union. The Constitution looks to an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States. Actual abolition of the States is impossible. There are, however, forces in operation which seek to reduce the States to administrative departments like those of France. There is an increasing tendency to regard a State as a mere geographical expression rather than a political division of the country.
> * * * We are threatened with a revival of federalism—federalism that is more extreme and radical than the leaders of the old Federal Party ever countenanced. The argument proceeds on the assumption that the States have failed to perform their duty properly, so that great evils have grown up which the States can not or will not remedy, and from which we should have been free if only the Federal Government had possessed the authority and not the States.
> That the evils exist is conceded. That the States have not done their full duty is also conceded. But that the Federal Government would have done better is a mere assumption, and one I am not prepared to accept. Congress has now in the Territories and District of Columbia all the powers which the State governments possess; yet the legislation respecting the corporations which Congress has enacted has not been better than the legislation of the States on the same subject.

We have received commissions from the people and have sworn to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States. It is not an idle ceremony but one pregnant with meaning and significance. We should uphold and defend the Constitution of our country, not only against foes from without but foes from within. This Nation will never be successfully assailed from without. If it should ever fall, or cease to function as designed by the fathers, it will be because of the weakness, vanity, infidelity, or treason of the people themselves.

Vocational Education for Disabled Soldiers, Sailors, and Marines.

OF

HON. JOHN F. MILLER,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, there is no more important work being carried on in this country at the present time than that being done by the Federal Board for Vocational Education in the reeducation of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines. I desire to call the attention of the Congress and the country to the way in which this work is being expedited and perfected through a cooperative arrangement between the Federal board and a patriotic private agency.

Heretofore the plight of the disabled soldier has not been a happy one. The Government was grateful to him for the sacrifice he had made and did its best to atone to him and requite him. It used the only means it knew of, and that was a monetary pension, usually inadequate, and, at best, a poor return. For those who were so badly disabled that they could not work, soldiers' homes were provided, but the home provided by the Government was not, at best, the kind of home the soldier would provide for himself. These soldiers' homes filled with men without vocational training and with no physical activities of a useful character, and without any home influences about them, failed to bring to the soldier the personal peace of mind so essential to his happiness and well-being.

In the war which has just come to a conclusion it was found quite by accident that disabled men could be retrained and taught to do some one thing as well as a man who had never been injured. This discovery was made in France at the home of M. Schollaert, a Belgian gentleman, who took in and cared for a number of disabled, wounded Belgian soldiers who had no asylum in their own country. In their days of convalescence they happened to amuse themselves trying to work at various trades with which they were familiar. It was noted that their recovery was stimulated; and those incapacitated from following their former trades were managing to acquire a knowledge of some other trade not incompatible with the injuries sustained. The discovery was immediately developed by the Belgian Government, by France, by England, and by Canada until it has become one of the real and permanent benefits arising out of this war; for by this accidental discovery and its growth to present importance civilization has found that there is no necessity for the existence of a man unable to earn; that he can be of use, notwithstanding the seriousness of his injury.

Under the forced draft of necessity this system has been perfected to a wonderful degree. The United States Government has adopted it, and is now retraining and vocationally rehabilitating such of its disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines as require it, in order that they may continue to be useful individuals in civil life. This work was confided by Congress, without a dissenting vote, to the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the bill being approved June 27, 1918, and within less than nine weeks afterwards the first man was placed for reeducation. The United States system goes further than that of most of the continental countries, for in addition to training the disabled man it also finds a place for him in which to work at whatever he has been trained to do. The Federal board has a placement division and so arranges matters that when the men under training are competent in their respective lines employment will be ready and waiting for them.

The Government allows a support fund of at least $65 per month for each man while he is undergoing this process of rehabilitation, with allotments to his dependents upon a fairly liberal scale. The reeducation is absolutely free, all expense of books, tuition, library, laboratory, or other fees being paid by the Government. The training is given in the best institutions of the United States, ranging from Harvard and Yale, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Case School of Applied Science, Columbia University, and the various land-grant colleges of the States, to agricultural schools, scientific schools, trade and industrial schools, and, in many instances, direct to the industries and commerce. Altogether there are some 500 trades, professions, occupations, callings, and industries from which a choice may be made by the disabled man. He is by no means confined to manual trades or occupations. The sole animating and dominating thought and object of the Government, as expressed and carried out through its agent, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, is to do that thing for the disabled man which will insure to him the greatest possibility of future usefulness, happiness, and contentment, according to his capabilities.

Fourteen district or branch offices have been established by the Federal board, respectively, at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Atlanta, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Denver, San Francisco, Seattle, and Dallas. These district offices were established so as to enable the Federal board to reach disabled men in all sections of the country and to handle their cases with greater dispatch and thoroughness than if the work was all concentrated at Washington. The total Federal force of the Government scattered throughout the 14 districts is about 250 men. All of them have qualified under civil-service requirements for the special positions which they hold.

By the policy of placing these disabled men in the existing institutions of the country it is figured that the Government has been saved over $25,000,000, which would have been a reasonable cost had all the men in training and to be trained been assembled in one or two institutions especially provided and controlled by the Federal Government. By using the existing institutions of America, representing an investment of over $300,000,000, there is available for the disabled man an infinitely greater opportunity than could possibly be given under any institution inaugurated especially for this work. Placing the men in existing institutions instead of herding them in great camps of crippled and disabled men has a beneficial effect upon the men themselves, causing them to lose sight of their disabilities and to minimize them and concentrate their attention upon the capabilities remaining to them.

This is, in effect, the secret—if there is a secret—about the success of rehabilitation work, which is simply to disregard the disability and concentrate on the remaining assets, taking them and training the men to make use of them to their fullest extent. It may be illustrated by the case of a man who has lost both his legs. He could be made into a very efficient tailor, doubtless, because the tailor's work is done with his hands, and the presence or absence of pedal extremities has no bearing whatever upon the character of work he does or his ability to do work with his hands and arms. The same principle prevails throughout many varieties of work.

This, in brief, is the program of the United States Government for its disabled men. In addition to this retraining by which these men are often enabled to earn wages greatly in excess of those which they were making in civil life before the war, they are given their compensation for the injuries received, and this compensation is absolutely unaffected by any increase in earning capacity occasioned by the retraining. This compensation begins after the training allowance ends, and this training allowance ends when the man has been made competent in his line and is placed in a position and goes upon the pay roll. Then his compensation starts and is in addition to whatever he may earn.

There will be no more useless, embittered men wearing their lives away in soldiers' homes. There will be no more of veterans depending upon a pittance of a pension, feeling that they are apart from the ordinary run of men and that the doors of opportunity are closed to them. Each man will be restored to the equality of opportunity and the light of hope and happiness rekindled in each bosom.

Congress has passed the best, and on the whole the most liberal, law of all the countries for the reeducation and placement in employment of the disabled heroes of the war and will not spare the money necessary to extend the benefits of this act to all those wounded or diseased in the service of the country. Private organizations of a semipublic character, like the American Red Cross and the National Catholic War Council, have given liberally of their funds to the special fund for rehabilitation provided under the act by which gifts and donations may be received and used to supplement the funds provided by Congress to carry out its provisions.

Some things absolutely necessary, however, to the success of this work were not and probably could not be provided or anticipated by the Congress when the vocational-rehabilitation act was passed. Experience has shown that publicity through every possible means must be extended to every portion of the country—cities, towns, hamlets, and lonely farms—in order to furnish information to discharged men and to their families concerning the liberal provisions which have been made to make the future of disabled men safe for themselves and their dependents. This requires the use of bulletin, pamphlet, tract, magazine, newspaper, billboard, and the film service, which is our greatest agency to-day for reaching the great mass of the American people. Such a program involves in many of its aspects an expenditure of money such as a public agency probably could not be expected to provide. Seeing this, the National Elks War Relief Commission has arranged to underwrite for a voluntary committee working in cooperation with the Federal board the cost of a program of publicity which shall inform every disabled man and his family of his rights and opportunities and to call to the attention of the employers, wageworkers, and the public their duty of cooperation in this matter and the ways in which they can be of most vital help.

Many men who are entitled to the benefits of the war-risk insurance act and of the vocational-rehabilitation act have been discharged from the service and are scattered throughout the country. In many instances these men are not even aware up to the present time of their rights and opportunities. They are knocking in rapidly increasing numbers at the door of the district offices of the Federal board asking for help. They are without their Army pay as discharged men. Their allotments and allowances to their dependents have ceased. With their handicaps they are unable to earn a living. While their compensation cases are being adjudicated it has been impossible for the Federal board to put these men primarily into training. They suffer privation and humiliation and oftentimes give up in despair their hope of taking the reeducation which the Federal board is willing to provide for them as soon as they are adjudged to be compensable cases. By the use of the fund which the National Elks War Relief Commission has provided an act can be performed lying entirely outside the purview of the vocational-rehabilitation act, and absolutely necessary for its successful administration and to the welfare of the men for whom the act was designed. Loans to the men can be made promptly at the district offices of the Federal board in order that they may be put into training immediately. This is necessary since it is not possible for any Government agency to pay money to men in advance to put them in training. Arrangements will be made so that these loans will be paid back by the men as soon as they have received the amounts due them from the Government. In this way the soldier will be treated not as a problem of social relief but as a soldier of the Republic in straitened circumstances because assets due him from the Government are unpaid. As the result it will be possible for the Federal board to put at least a thousand men in training almost immediately whose cases have been dragging for many weeks.

Rising to meet this situation the War Risk Insurance Bureau has promptly agreed that on the face of certain records furnished by the Federal board it will accept the cases as being prima facie compensable and will place the man upon their compensation lists and send his checks to him promptly. With these two devices it will be possible to speed up from 60 to 120 days all the whole program of the care and treatment, education, and placement of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines.

With the same vision and broad liberality the National Elks War Relief Commission has provided through its funds for the entire support and training of these worthy men who, because of any technicality, lie outside the purview of the war-risk insurance act, and therefore of the vocational-rehabilitation act. A man who was injured by some accident previous to October 6, 1917, will be cared for under this arrangement. Those who, for technical reasons, are ruled not to be entitled to compensation, who need retraining because of injuries or disease incurred in the service, will be cared for. In addition, those American citizens who rushed to the support of the allies before we entered the war by joining one of the allied armies, or who since we entered the war have, in the spirit of adventure, entered other services and were injured while fighting the Hun, are to be reeducated and placed in employment through the medium of the fund which the Elks have provided. As the Members of Congress will instantly recognize, this is not possible under the war-risk insurance act or the vocational-rehabilitation act, since both provide only for those who are disabled in the service of the United States against Germany and her allies. Foreigners serving in our National Army are entitled to the benefit of the two acts, but American citizens serving with the allies are not. Hence the liberal provision which the Elks have made to cover their cases, in order that they, too, may have a chance for the future, and the country may be saved from the sad spectacle of dependency on the part of those willing to give their all in the fight for democracy.

Realizing the above program and desiring to participate directly in it, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, through the National Elks War Relief Commission, has placed at the disposal of the Federal board a quarter of a million dollars to be used in this humane and practical work, enabling the Federal board to carry on much of its work without being subjected to the delay of technical rules and regulations, which, in many cases, would defeat the object of the vocational-education law.

The Elks fund thus provided is the first instance of the kind in the history of the country where a great patriotic fraternal organization has come to the aid of the Government in so timely, helpful, and substantial a manner. This money will be used to help disabled men who desire to enter immediately upon vocational training, but who are without funds to meet their immediate needs.

The necessity for quick action in getting these men into training and the obstacles facing the Federal board by a lack of elasticity in the appropriation of Government funds all tend toward bringing about a situation in which thousands of worthy cases would themselves suffer, as well as the helpless and innocent dependents of these soldiers, sailors, and marines who have been victims of war. The Elks, with their generosity, have enabled the Federal board to act quickly and rescue many of these cases and prevent a continuance of conditions which in numerous instances have been found most distressing.

OF
HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,
OF NEW YORK,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, on January 13 I introduced a bill for a change in the court-martial procedure, and on January 23, on the floor of the House, I discussed a number of military trials which showed that rank injustice had been perpetrated. On February 3 I introduced a resolution which would have resulted in a most thorough investigation of these outrages, but was unable to obtain consideration for it, although I appeared in person before the Rules Committee and urged a favorable report. Since then, on March 4, there appeared a defense of the procedure in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in an extension of remarks by Representative LUNN, which quoted a letter of Gen. Crowder made public for the first time on the very day that Congress was adjourning.

Gen. Crowder is forced to admit the injustices practiced in 13 cases, and has not answered 12 cases. When it is claimed that the proper authorities did not have knowledge of these conditions, then the memories of some gentlemen must have grown very weak, as is shown from the following article from the New York Globe of March 12, 1919, which reads as follows:

CROWDER AND COURTS-MARTIAL.

EDITOR GLOBE: When Secretary of War Baker in his blanket defense of Judge Advocate Gen. Crowder stated that he, the Secretary of War, did not recall prior to the war that "our military system of law ever became the subject of public attack on the ground of its structural defects" he placed himself on record as being probably the only officer or official connected with the War Department who was not aware that in 1914 an elaborate series of articles setting forth case after case of cruelty, injustice, and abuse that shocked the commonest instincts of justice was published in Harper's Weekly.

These articles were based upon hundreds of cases in the War Department and which the Judge Advocate General's Department permitted me to go over. Later, when I was fortified with facts and a knowledge of the department's methods, I asked questions which proved embarrassing and I was peremptorily denied further access to these public records of public court-martial trials.

Every charge that I then made against the Judge Advocate General's Department for its abuses and its injustices has been amply justified in the recent investigation by a committee of Congress and by the report of the special committee of the American Bar Association appointed to probe these War Department scandals in the Judge Advocate General's Department.

So conspicuous was this exposure of the abuses, both structural and incidental, in the court-martial system that it is amazing that Secretary Baker should deny all knowledge of it in his eagerness to defend Judge Advocate Gen. Crowder's administration, for the Army and Navy Club, of which, I believe, Gen. Crowder himself is a member, so objected to any breath of criticism or exposure of Army abuses that Harper's Weekly, which published the exposures, was barred from its reading room. Innumerable letters which I received from officers and enlisted men of our Army at that time showed that these exposures were the talk of every Army post and Army garrison in the United States.

Case after case I cited merely as illustrations to prove that enlisted men were inhumanly punished by long sentences at hard labor in prison for slight infractions of discipline. I charged that the court-martial system in Gen. Crowder's department was an ancient system, taken, substantially unchanged, then and since, from the British Army court-martial system of 140 years ago, when armies were recruited by press gangs from the illiterate scum of population and beaten into the ranks as soldiers. I charged that habitually enlisted men were punished in times of peace with reckless severity and prison sentences for slight infractions of discipline when officers who committed crimes of embezzlement and fraud against the soldiers under them, with whose funds they were intrusted, were lightly punished by a simple dismissal from the Army without prison sentence.

One of these cases was a violation of regulations which resulted in manslaughter, and not a word of which was whispered into the trial—on a trivial charge—of the officer responsible; nor was he even dismissed for the death of the soldier in his command, whose death was due to the violation.

Another incident was that of a soldier who was punished by two separate sentences of two years each at hard labor in prison, because he had been tried by the court-martial upon two charges, each being merely separate descriptions of the identical offense, the maximum for the offense itself being two years in prison.

There is not an officer in the Regular Army of four years ago who is not thoroughly familiar with the Harper's Weekly exposure of the court-martial abuses, even if Secretary Baker himself is not.

The letter which Secretary of War Baker asked Gen. Crowder to write in his own defense is unique. In no way does Judge Advocate Gen. Crowder attempt to meet the issue or deny the exposures of the congressional committee as to abuses and inhumanities in his department; Gen. Crowder merely attacks the courage of Gen. Ansell for making these abuses public.

As to the legal argument, Gen. Crowder, in substance, states that he was powerless to revise the abuses of lack of revision of the court-martial cases, because it was necessary for Congress to pass adequate legislation. This is disingenuous. Congress passes the organic law, the Articles of War, and every legislative enactment governing the War Department and other governmental departments. But, like every other great governmental department, Congress also empowers that department to establish its own rules and regulations under the congressional organic law for the administration of the department. These rules are covered in the department in a series of volumes known as the Opinions of the Judge Advocate General, which are the departmental interpretations of the organic law and are merely regulations only for the department, but which may be changed by the department itself, since the department itself is the supreme authority as to its own regulations.

Gen. Crowder has simply held that he has no power of review, which is his opinion as Judge Advocate General. He could also have held that he had power of review of court-martial cases as being the interpretation of the organic law, and there would be no one to gainsay him in either case. Gen. Crowder had the power to reverse the opinions of the Judge Advocate General that preceded him in a similar way to that in which any departmental chief can, where no legal matter is involved. For years past Gen. Crowder has elected to defend the court-martial system in its most inhuman, unjust, and outrageous and abusive forms, and on his head alone is the responsibility for the present general public condemnation.

It is because Gen. Crowder has believed that justice has nothing to do with the court-martial system that he has held to the theory that his power should only concern itself with the clerical and routine correctness of the court-martial procedure. It is Gen. Crowder's duty under the law to regulate the administration of justice by court-martial, and he has interpreted it to uphold an archaic and abusive court-martial system instead of interpreting it according to the decencies and justice of American fair dealing in Army life.

CHARLES JOHNSON POST.

NEW YORK, March 11.

It will be the duty of the Sixty-sixth Congress to most thoroughly look into the whole court-martial procedure and see that justice in the fullest sense of the term is obtained for the men now unfairly and unjustly incarcerated. The light of day must be thrown into all of these proceedings and the procedure of the dark ages eradicated.

Work of the War Congress.

OF
HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
OF MINNESOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, the world-war war Congress will not soon be forgotten. In addition to the regular work which falls to each Congress in legislating for ordinary peacetime needs, the war Congress undertook at a moment's notice the enormous and unprecedented task of organizing and equipping armies of millions of men for the purpose of carrying on war across more than 3,000 miles of ocean and raising revenues and loans amounting to scores of billions of dollars. Our interest charges are now approaching the staggering sum of $1,500,000,000 a year, nearly twice the national debt at the beginning of the world war. The War Department up to the 1st of March, 1919, states that 107,444 deaths occurred from all causes in the American Expeditionary Forces and among the troops in the United States. Of these, 72,951 were in the Expeditionary Forces, and of this number 20,829 died of disease, 48,768 from injuries received in battle, and 3,354 from all other causes. The figures show that the total number of deaths from disease exceeded the total battle casualties by more than 5,000.

All battle casualties were 240,197. One million three hundred and ninety thousand United States men actually participated in engagements against the enemy. So huge were the expenditures that a road 60 feet wide and 25,000 miles long, circling the earth, could be paved with $1 bills so expended.

WASTING THE REPUBLIC'S WEALTH.

A great deal of this expense could have been avoided had America accepted a reasonable program of preparedness prior to our entering into the war; so also if we had refused to finance the allied nations and financed only our own forces when we entered the world conflict. The allies boasted a great preponderance in men, money, and munitions over the central powers. I have always held that there was no necessity for bringing America to the verge of bankruptcy by loaning money to foreigners, some of whom will never repay the amount loaned to them, or even the interest on the same. They do not and will not fully appreciate what we have done for them. "There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation." (Washington's Farewell Address.)

UNCONSTITUTIONAL CONSCRIPTION ACT.

Conscription for foreign service was forced upon the American people by Congress without their having anything to say about it, contrary to the plain provision of the United States Constitution. I say this though I am well aware of the recent decision of the Supreme Court stating that the law was constitutional. The whole Supreme Court, in my opinion, does not balance equal as against the opinion of Daniel Webster, who held such a law unconstitutional and made a speech against it in Congress. Others opposed the bill, and it was defeated, and the Sixty-sixth Congress ought at once to repeal this unconstitutional law.

AN EPOCHAL CONGRESS.

The opening days of the Sixty-fifth Congress marked an epoch in the national history of the United States. They marked an epoch in the history of the world. The short closing session of the Sixty-fourth Congress followed a bitterly contested national election, which was fought and won on the issue of peace or war. The slogan "He kept us out of war" won the election for the Democratic Party. The city of Minneapolis gave an overwhelming vote to Mr. Wilson on the strength of that campaign cry. Notwithstanding the heavy Democratic vote for President, I was elected congressional Representative on the Republican ticket by the fifth district of our State. This district comprises the town of St. Anthony and 10 wards in the city of Minneapolis. My platform was "America first. Absolute neutrality."

AMERICA FIRST—ABSOLUTE NEUTRALITY.

In my personal campaign the slogan was "America first. Absolute neutrality." My record in Congress shows that this was not merely an empty phrase, coined for the purpose of winning the election. I have placed and shall continue to place "America first" in every vote.

Immediately after the November, 1916, election I closed my affairs in Minneapolis and went to Washington, D. C., four months before I took my seat in Congress. This I did in order to utilize the closing session of the Sixty-fourth Congress in familiarizing myself with the duties of a Congressman. The session closed on March 4, 1917. In the ordinary course of events the Sixty-fifth Congress would not have convened until December. It became evident that an extra session would be called, and I remained in Washington through the short period of adjournment.

Immediately following the national election, won on the platform of "He kept us out of war," the intention of the President to force a declaration of war against Germany became apparent. The extra session of Congress was called for April 16, 1917.

THE FIRST PEOPLE'S VOTE ON WAR.

Believing that a matter involving the life and fortune of every man, woman, and child in America should not be decided without the approval of those who must, in the event of war, bear the lion's share of the burden, I determined that my vote should not be counted until my constituents had been given an opportunity to declare their wishes. I therefore submitted the question of peace or war to the 54,000 voters in the fifth district of Minnesota. This was the first time in the history of our Republic that the people of a congressional district were given an opportunity to vote for or against war.

The response to my referendum ballots was prompt and unmistakable in sentiment. The returns showed a vote of 8 to 1 against war.

PRESIDENT FORCES WAR—PEOPLE OPPOSED.

Every day that passed it became more and more apparent that the plain people did not favor war.

The date for the convening of Congress was suddenly changed by the President from April 16 to April 2. On the evening of that day, at 8.30 p. m., President Wilson appeared before Congress and asked for a formal declaration of war against Germany.

VOTED ON WAR AS PEOPLE VOTED.

Four days later the war resolution came before the House for a vote. I had received the mandate of my constituents. In obedience to that mandate, I was one of 50 in the House who voted against war. For that vote I offer neither apology nor excuse. My speech in the House on April 5, 1917, on "The world war" sets forth my views on this great issue. Every contention which I made and every argument which I advanced at that time has been justified and confirmed by later events.

VOTED AGAINST CONSCRIPTION.

Consistent with my vote against war with Germany, I was one of 24 Members in the House who voted against conscription for foreign service. This vote was also in accordance with the wishes of my constituents, as well as with my own principles. I voted for a volunteer army for foreign service, and offered my personal services in that army.

THE PRESIDENT IGNORED ROOSEVELT AND THOSE WHO WISHED TO GO WITH HIM.

Furthermore, I have always advocated an adequate preparedness in State and Nation, and shall continue to vote for an adequate, sane, and sensible program of preparedness whenever opportunity offers.

SUPPORTED WAR WHEN DECLARED.

Having done all in the power of one Member of Congress to avert the calamity of war, I gave my whole-hearted support to the successful prosecution of the war. I have unhesitatingly voted for every measure in the interest of our soldiers and sailors called to the colors.

SENATOR PETTIGREW'S PLAN TO CONSCRIPT WEALTH FOR WAR.

The following letter from former Senator Pettigrew, of South Dakota, lays down a rule which is a great improvement on the present plan both for financing and fighting future wars:

AUGUST 24, 1917.

Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Last February, while I was at Washington and before war was declared on the part of the United States, I published an article in one of the single-tax papers advocating that in case we went to war with Germany we should hire the men to do the fighting and draft the money instead of drafting the men and hiring the money. This statement attracted considerable attention and the Socialist papers have been advocating this plan ever since.

The report of the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, has been received and shows that 357,000 persons receive an income of $1,200,000,000—that is, they paid taxes upon that amount. Of course, that does not include those who did not make a report or swore their income through at less than it was; nor does it include artificial persons, and therefore the income of these 357,000 people was probably nearer $2,000,000,000 than $1,200,000,000. The ones who receive this amount of income only include incomes exceeding $3,000 per year. In other words, from all incomes are deducted $3,000, leaving a balance of $1,200,000,000 for 357,000 persons.

Now that the conscription bill has been passed and the Government has conscripted 1,000,000 men to do the fighting, I propose that Congress pass a law conscripting this $1,200,000,000 a year and pay it to the million men who are conscripted to lay down their lives in order that these people may continue, from year to year, to gather these incomes. This would give each soldier $100 per month and enable him to decently support his family, if he has one, or send it to his parents, who have paid the expense of rearing him and giving him an education.

If we are going to "make the world safe for democracy," wouldn't it be a good idea to commence in the United States, and, having drafted a million of our boys to do the fighting, let us draft $1,200,000,000 from our millionaires. It was the laborers of this country who produced all of this wealth. These 357,000 produced none of it. They exploited the laboring people out of it by cunning, by manipulation, with the assistance of the laws and the lawyers and the courts and the machinery of legislation and the Government.

Why not, then, during the war appropriate this excess profit and pay the men that do the fighting? Why should we violate the Constitution and issue bonds in order to get money to pay the men who sacrifice their lives? Congress is in session, and if the administration has any interest in making the world "safe for democracy" they could order their rubber stamps at the Capitol, the House and the Senate, to pass this law conscripting the wealth, and it would go through at once.

I have carefully read some of the legislation that Congress has enacted recently, and while I do not advise anyone to violate the provisions of the law, I advise everyone who has any interest in democratic institutions to urge the repeal of the law with regard to conscription and the law suppressing freedom of assembly, freedom of speech, and freedom of the press. In my opinion these laws and the law declaring war violate the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Ten Commandments, and every one of those laws should be immediately repealed, if we have any interest in the maintenance of democratic institutions.

* * * * * * *

Yours, very truly,

R. F. PETTIGREW.

In my speech on the resolution declaring war I said:

Conscription, always distasteful to a free people, may soon stalk through the land, hand in hand with his brothers—war and death. If you conscript men for war, conscript wealth for war.

Out of our surplus we stand ready, as always, to share with the needy of other countries. But we must think first of our own soldiers and of our own people at home, who are unitedly and enthusiastically standing back of and supporting our fighting men. We can not do our best unless we are well and fully fed. Hysterical self-denial defeats its own ends.

RESOLUTION TO CARE FOR OUR FOOD SUPPLY.

On October 1, 1917, I introduced a resolution in Congress (H. J. Res. 158) directing the President to place an embargo upon such food supplies as are found necessary for home consumption and for the supply of our soldiers at home and abroad, and further directing the President, when necessary to the public welfare, to seize food supplies and apportion them among the people. This resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture. Hoover, for 20 years a resident of London, was sent here to farm the "Yanks." So well did he succeed that to-day Australia boasts 200,000,000 bushels surplus in wheat, while England suffers a plague of rats due to her numerous filled grain bins.

We were urged on every hand to "save, save, save" food. Truly, in time of war, and in peace also, we should guard against wastage of food. That is a self-evident duty. But avoidance of waste does not mean that we must unreasonably reduce our own consumption. The frequent and thoughtless accusation that Americans eat too much is as false as it is unjust. Americans, as a whole, work, and people who work, whether with brain, or with hand, or with both, require an ample supply of nourishing food to repair the waste and replace the energy expended in their labor. It is a safe general rule that the labor performed by any people is in direct ratio to the amount and quality of food consumed by them. The better and more varied the dietary, the greater the amount and the higher the quality of the labor performed.

At whatever cost of labor and resource we must see to it that our own people are well and fully fed. If we starve or stint ourselves we shall aid neither our soldiers nor the allies. On the contrary, we can help them best by supporting them as vigorously as only a well-nourished people can do. Listless anemia never won a victory.

COAL FOR HOMES FIRST.

In midsummer of 1917 I saw, what any thoughtful person could see, that coal was being shipped across the border of the United States into Canada at an alarming rate. Our own people and the people of the other Northwestern States were facing a heavy shortage of hard and soft coal. On August 21, 1917, I introduced a resolution in Congress, directing the President to seize and hold sufficient coal in the United States for home consumption. Had the provisions of this resolution been placed in effect, the hardship, suffering, and death caused by lack of fuel last winter would have been avoided. Such action was not taken by the President, and untold hardship and suffering was endured by millions of our citizens during one of the most rigorous winters this country has ever experienced. We must insist upon a permanent and fixed policy of "America first; foreigners second."

Such a fixed policy as this would prevent a repetition of last winter's unnecessary suffering and its resultant effect on the morale of our people.

EFFICIENCY AND ECONOMY LEGISLATION.

During the war we drifted far from the true course of efficiency and economy. In Minnesota to-day we have State insurance on public buildings. This law, of which I was author, saved the State hundreds of thousands of dollars.

I brought this law to Minnesota as a copy from the Wisconsin law.

I was also author of the bill to give the city of Minneapolis a purchasing department. This has resulted in a great saving of money for the city.

When I first entered the legislature I voted alone against the legislative graft, at the beginning of the session, of the so-called supplies resolution. Two years later a great saving was effected there.

I am opposed to garden-seed Congressmen; I do not see why Members of Congress should have the handling of seeds which certainly ought to be handled by the Department of Agriculture. During the war emergency of necessity the seeds must be sent out, since many thousands of home gardens were cultivated. Now that Congress is returning to peace conditions, a change ought to be effected in this respect.

TEMPERANCE LEGISLATION.

While a member of the Minnesota Legislature I voted in favor of submitting State-wide prohibition to a vote of the people. On county option I voted "no." This bill provided that when the county voted dry it remained dry; with this I had no quarrel, but when a majority voted wet the county did not remain wet. The question might then again be submitted to the voters through local option, a double-barreled proposition, unfair and absolutely contrary to the principle of majority rule. If they want a dry country, let them vote it dry themselves; if they want a wet country, they are entitled to that. Let the people decide. As a Member of Congress I voted to refer national prohibition to a referendum of the State legislatures. This amendment is now a part of the Nation's Constitution.

The national bone-dry law, forcing prohibition upon the people by a vote of Congress without submitting the question to a popular vote, was passed while I was in Europe studying war conditions. I am opposed to this sort of legislation in temperance matters, and had I been in my seat I would have voted "no." The people should have something to say on this question.

OUR MINNEAPOLIS REFERENDUM ON WAR AND CONSCRIPTION THE FIRST.

My first act after I became a Member of the Sixty-fifth Congress was to prepare and submit to the citizens of my district in the city of Minneapolis letters providing them an opportunity for a referendum vote on war and conscription. This was the first referendum on war and conscription ever held in a congressional district.

On February 28 I introduced a bill to provide by law that hereafter the people of the United States shall always have the right to vote on war.

I now submit for the permanent RECORD of Congress the method and letters sent out:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 30, 1917.

DEAR FRIEND: With State and National problems of unusual importance pressing for solution, these are times when the people should be consulted. That a Member of Congress shall be representative in fact of their sentiments is an ever-increasing demand of the people.

You have given me your power of attorney and I believe that it is the highest form of representative government to use it in accordance with your wishes and as your conscience directs.

Elected to Congress by the people of Minneapolis, I am here to serve them. At all times I aim to be your representative here in the council of the Nation.

I do not hold lightly the confidence of almost 20,000 friends who gave me victory at the polls last November in the face of the most strenuous opposition. I am grateful to my friends for their loyal support.

From time to time I hope to acquaint you with my record. I shall indeed be greatly pleased if I can win the approval of the average citizen of the great and growing city of Minneapolis. Remember, I shall always value highly your opinion on public questions.

Assuring you of my desire to serve you and your friends faithfully, I am, with best wishes,

Sincerely, yours,

ERNEST LUNDEEN.

I believe that the people should be consulted before Congress declares war.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., August 25, 1917.

DEAR FRIEND: I believe the people should have the right to decide whether or not they are to die on foreign battle fields. Conscription should be settled at the ballot box. Those who do the fighting and foot the bills should have a voice in all matters of such vital concern. In that belief, I submitted a war ballot to the voters on March 30, 1917. This was the first congressional referendum on war in the history of our country.

Thousands of these ballots were delayed in the mails until after the vote in Congress on the war resolution, April 6. The press published an interview with the superintendent of mails at Minneapolis, tending to discourage the voting. Our time was shortened by two weeks when the President suddenly advanced the special session from April 16 to April 2. These were some of the difficulties with which we had to contend. The following is the result:

For war	2,023
For conscription	3,198
Against war	16,822
Against conscription	15,381

Elections held in a number of cities and villages throughout the United States gave an overwhelming majority against entering the world war.

The press, eager for war, published grossly false statements about Members of the House and Senate who voted against the war resolution. Most of these statements are so manifestly malicious as to refute themselves and are unworthy of serious notice. However, I can not at this time refrain from denouncing as utterly untrue the published story that I was "too busy" to attend the joint session of the two Houses when the President addressed the Congress, and had "no time" to read the war message. Not only did I hear, read, and study the President's message, but I was the first Congressman to analyze it in a speech before the House of Representatives.

While newspapers were stating that I had been assigned to "dead" committees, the Republican Publicity Association, of which ex-Senator Jonathan Bourne is president, had the following to say: "Representative ERNEST LUNDEEN of Minnesota, although not yet 40 years old, has been placed on two of the prominent committees of the House—Territories and Irrigation—an honor seldom extended to a man just entering on his first term in the House."

It was reported that I had been expelled from Patterson Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars. It is, however, a matter of record that I am still a member. Twisted and distorted statements are the order of the day, but falsehood and ridicule can not endure.

One other misstatement I will correct. An impression has been created that a Congressman's speeches are printed at the expense of the Government. Such is not the case. Each Member pays for his own speeches on the basis of actual cost; circular letters are purchased at the prevailing commercial prices.

My constant aim as your Congressman is to be truly representative of the sentiments of the fifth district and of the best interests of the American people. I would rather stand by the people than stand by the President.

Sincerely, yours, ERNEST LUNDEEN.

BILL FOR REFERENDUM ON WAR.

An advisory referendum of the people on war was provided for in H. R. 16202, which I introduced in the House of Representatives February 28, 1919:

A bill (H. R. 16202) to provide for an advisory referendum vote of the people of the United States on all declarations of war by the Government of the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever there arises a question as to a declaration of war or the making of war by the United States against any foreign nation, the question shall first be submitted to an advisory referendum vote of the voters of all the States of the Union.

SEC. 2. That whenever the said question of declaring or making war by the United States shall arise, the Congress shall by resolution notify the Secretary of State that he is hereby empowered and directed to call a special election of all the qualified electors in each State for registering their approval or disapproval of the said proposed declaration of war or making of war.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized and directed to print and furnish to the people of each State, through the State governments, the necessary copies (one for each citizen) of the proposed declaration of war and the ballots and election papers for said election; all costs of said election shall be paid by the Government of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the regular election officers of each State shall have charge of the polling of the votes and the conduct of the election in accordance with the forms and laws of each of the several States.

SEC. 5. That a joint committee of 30 Members (15 Members of the House and 15 Members of the Senate), of which committee the Vice President of the United States shall be ex officio chairman, shall act as a final board of canvassers to determine and announce the result of the said advisory referendum election.

SEC. 6. That the governor of each State shall transmit to the Vice President, acting as chairman of the aforesaid joint committee of Congress, at Washington, D. C., the official returns of the election in his State within 30 days after the date of holding said election; and not less than 30 days later the aforesaid joint committee of Congress shall announce the result of the election for the entire United States.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Full woman suffrage is but an act of delayed justice. How men have so long refused their sisters the vote is one of the surprises of modern history.

To-day many of the world's greatest nations are leading the United States in democracy, in that they grant women the full vote. Very soon Members of Congress, members of the legislature as well as the voters themselves who now vote against woman suffrage will run to cover with profuse apologies.

I am for it, heart and soul, come what may! Women and men, men and women, henceforth together must rule America.

I am glad I lived to see the day when my vote held the balance of power in the House of Representatives on this question and that I cast it in favor of woman suffrage.

Equal suffrage came before the House of Representatives January 10, 1918, and received exactly the two-thirds majority necessary for a proposed constitutional amendment. I voted in the affirmative. Had I voted "no" the proposed amendment would have failed.

While a member of the Minnesota Legislature I voted for woman suffrage. I stood strongly for the cause in the days when it was extremely unpopular to do so. In the first suffrage parade held in Minneapolis I was the only State official in the marching column, and I am now doing all in my power to aid the amendment in the Senate.

We can no longer afford to have it said that we, as a Nation, do not believe in equal suffrage. Democracy rests upon the solid foundation of full suffrage for men and women. The victory will soon be complete. Nothing can stop this great measure.

THE LADY FROM MONTANA.

Now and then life reveals rare characters which all must admire. In the Sixty-fifth Congress no Member showed greater courage and self-sacrifice, no one was readier to die a political death for principle, than the brilliant and accomplished lady from Montana. If the voters of her State do not return her to the House or Senate at some later date I feel sorry for them. The loss of her services is not only a loss to Montana but to the whole people.

Whatever prejudices there may have been when she first entered the House of Representatives, Miss RANKIN has the good will of every Member of the House when she leaves.

Equal suffrage is stronger to-day because of her; her imprint is clear on much important legislation. In her the elements so mix that we can truly say she is a noble woman.

EXPERIENCES ON THE WAR FRONT.

On the morning of July 12, 1918, I left Washington to study war conditions in Europe, and sailed from New York July 14 on the Adriatic, a 25,000-ton troopship carrying American soldiers. Our convoy consisted of a large number of transports guarded by many destroyers, balloons, aeroplanes, and subchasers.

Several vessels were sunk in our path near us, notably the 32,234-ton Justicia, compelling us to change our course. Zigzagging was constantly used during all of my ocean voyages. We arrived safely July 26 at Liverpool. Visited London and Southampton, England, and Havre, Rouen, and Paris, France.

CHATEAU-THIERRY.

At Chateau-Thierry, the turning point of the war, I saw our American boys advance to and cross the Vesle River. Finer troops and better spirit never appeared on the field of battle.

We dined with Gen. Pershing near Chaumont, France, and spent the afternoon there. Three days were spent, through the courtesy of the French, at Verdun, where we saw all of the forts and fields of that historic ground.

I visted Alsace-Lorraine, where our boys stand on German ground. There I had a flight in a Liberty-motor machine along the enemy lines, and I also had the pleasure of riding with our soldiers in a battle-scarred tank.

We visited Italy—Mount Grappa region, Piave River, and Montella; also the cities of Rome, Naples, Florence, Venice, Padua, the Italian headquarters, Verona, Milan, and Turin, not to mention Vesuvius and Pompeii. Returning to Paris, we spent one week on the American supply lines, extending from St. Nazaire and Nantes through Tours clear across the heart of France. Immense railway yards, docks, and storage facilities, salvage and camouflage plants, and great office buildings, costing billions upon billions, here astonish and cause wonder and pride on the part of all.

NEUTRAL SWITZERLAND.

Two weeks in neutral Switzerland convinced me that that brave people are really trying to be neutral and increased my admiration for that grand and beautiful country. Here the American Red Cross provide necessary supplies for American prisoners of war now in German prison camps.

After this I returned to Paris, London, and Folkestone, England, and spent further time in the British area, including Boulogne, Abbeville, Amiens, and Beauvais—newspaper statements to the contrary notwithstanding. Everywhere we were treated with courtesy and given every assistance by the American, French, English, Italian, and Swiss Governments.

I might add that I had a flight at the height of 1 mile above Paris in a British Sopwith machine. I shall never forget the magnificent view of that wonderful and historic city. While in Paris we were shelled for five days by the big long-range cannon, throwing giant shells 76 miles. We were also in Paris when the last great air raid brought death and destruction to that city.

I saw great docks and other immense American undertakings at Brest, and sailed from this port on an American transport on the 22d of October, arriving at Newport News on November 1 and Washington on November 2. In all we spent 28 days on the ocean and the English Channel and the balance of the time in England and on the Continent.

Our American boys are worthy of their fathers. They fight like tigers and die with a smile. Let us remember them always with—

VICIOUS SLANDER BY ASSOCIATED PRESS.

During my travel in Europe along the battle lines and while visiting American troops everywhere in Europe, the Associated Press dispatches gave out the false and malicious statement that Congressman DILLON and myself had been barred from the battle fronts, that we were being trailed by detectives, and giving the people at home generally to understand that we were either locked up or on the verge of being jailed. A more vicious and untrue statement was never given to the press. We visited wherever we desired to visit and we were everywhere treated with utmost courtesy. As Members of Congress we had the perfect right to go wherever American troops were located and wherever the American flags were flying, and we did so.

BRITISH RATIONS FOR OUR SOLDIERS ON TRANSPORTS.

In crossing the ocean on the Adriatic, a large convoy ship, we found some 3,000 San Francisco and California lads on our vessel, and from time to time we investigated their condition with a view toward securing for them the greatest degree of comfort. Imagine our indignation when we found them fed on British rations, though America was paying the British companies well for the transportation of these troops to Europe. We found that they were fed on rotten rabbit meat; that some of it was taken to the ship surgeon's office with the dung in it; and many other revolting instances came to our notice.

OUR SOLDIERS DENIED AMERICAN FOOD.

We were loud in our condemnations of such conduct on the part of people whom we were associated with in this great war. We demanded to see the quarters of the boys, and were taken through the ship's hold and through its cold-storage facilities. There we found thousands of boxes of oranges and California fruit, thousands of boxes of canned salmon, and other west-coast products, which perhaps these very lads had gathered and worked upon.

This food was being taken to foreigners, but none of it was given to the American soldiers on board, who were going to lay down their lives on the battle fields of France.

NO AMERICAN FLAGS.

In this entire convoy not one ship carried the American flag; and the only American flag seen on board our ship was the small American flag which I pinned on my own cabin wall.

No American Congressman could witness such revolting conditions without protesting in no uncertain language to the authorities on board. He would have been derelict in his duty, no matter what the consequences might be to him personally.

SOLDIERS WILL CALL OFFICIALS TO ACCOUNT.

When the boys come back home—and they will return sooner or later—we will hear their story, and it will be told with emphasis; and I predict here and now that the officials who were responsible for the miserable way in which American troops were transported like cattle across the Atlantic will be called to account by our soldier boys.

ORDNANCE SCHOOLS.

I am informed by returned soldiers that the Ordnance Department sent out circulars advertising six-weeks courses of training in "ordnance paper work" to be given in eight or ten universities. It was stated that men so trained "would do the work of noncommissioned officers," and only men with college training or exceptional business experience should apply. Application was made through the officers in charge of the "courses" at the various universities, with certified lists of credits and certificates of honorable dismissal from the colleges, graduates of which were biting at the bait. Tuition was paid at whatever rate the university chose to charge. Up until March, 1918, the men remained in civilian clothes until the completion of the "course," when they were herded to various camps or arsenals and subjected to another "course" almost an exact duplicate of the ones at the universities in general worthlessness.

After March 1, however, the men went through the process of "induction" and equipment, and were "furloughed" for the period of the course, and received 30 cents a day for living!

The personnel obtained by this fraudulent propaganda comprised many young men earning $5,000 a year and more as accountants, executives, and so forth, as well as struggling seniors in college, who borrowed money to meet the expenses of the course. All were filled with a desire to serve and felt that in the "ordnance supply work" they could utilize their experience to the best interest of the Government and secure moderate promotion for good service.

The result is best shown by a typical case:

A young man 24 years of age, a senior at a State university, secured entrance to a course at the University of Chicago after excessive red tape; was inducted into the service and borrowed $150 at 6 per cent to finance himself for the six weeks. From Chicago he was sent to Camp Hancock, where were concentrated all the supply courses in all the universities, conniving with the War Department. There were 5,000 of the finest men in the United States. The treatment accorded them for six or eight weeks here passes belief. They were made to do kitchen duty, dig ditches, pull grass laden with poison ivy, so that fully 50 per cent had the poison, haul garbage, and drill three hours per day in the broiling sun under the auspices of a loud-mouthed ex-newsboy who had bawled himself to the rank of captain.

When there was nothing else to do they went to school, the "classrooms" being empty tents for a week, the empty mess halls when the tents were needed.

From the mess halls they were graduated to stables, and the desks and chairs combined were dung heaps. The instructing was done by conscientious men who had swallowed the bait on a previous course and were made to do instructing which they hated. When "school was not in session" they did fatigue and kitchen duty along with the rest. The various companies were in charge of newly elected shave-tails and acting top sergeants.

UNJUST AND TYRANNICAL PUNISHMENTS.

The discipline put West Point into the pale. For a week no passes were given because a green recruit failed to salute a major, the lord high executioner of the school, as he flew by in an auto on the streets of Augusta, so that the 5,000 men were held absolutely in camp, and even in that particular portion of the camp devoted to the supply school.

Upon the completion of the "training," absolutely worthless, the men were split up, all remaining the lowest buck privates in the gamut, some being sent to ordnance depots in this country. The majority, however, were made into a provisional ordnance detachment and sent across. The particular outfit best known by the writer went on a rat-infested boat, one of the worst transports, an Italian vessel, and landed at dear old Brest in the midst of the midsummer "flu" epidemic, where they lay in pup tents for 10 days or more. From there they were shipped to Mehun and handed shovels and similar equipment, which they wielded for several weeks. Then, alphabetically and absolutely irrespective of training, experience, or aptitude shown in the "supply course," they were divided, some going to S. O. S. headquarters at Tours and the rest all along the front to roll shells and do other manual labor in dumps. Various ones were lucky enough to get in with an officer who would recommend their promotion, but the vast majority are still rolling in the hip-deep mud of "Sunny France," cursing the Ordnance Department in general and "supply courses" in particular with a well-deserved fervor.

SOLDIERS' OUTLAY SHOULD BE REPAID.

Every man who went to a university and spent coin of the Republic in equipping himself, supposedly to serve his country better, should be reimbursed for the money outlay. He never could be recompensed for the hours of work, toil, and worry he spent, laboring under the fond delusion, so subtly spread in the ordnance circulars, that he was on the high road to advancement and worth-while service.

REPEAL OF CONSCRIPTION ACT.

Believing that the conscription act was unconstitutional, un-American, and repugnant to the wishes of the large majority of the American people, on August 28, 1918, I offered the following resolution for its repeal:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 145) to repeal an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," commonly known as the "conscription act."

Whereas Public act No. 12 (65th Cong., H. R. 3545), entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," is also known as the "selective draft" or "selective conscription" act; and

Whereas conscription for foreign service is un-American and undemocratic; and

Whereas it is officially announced that American citizens conscripted under said act are to be transported to foreign countries to fight on foreign soil against the true meaning and intent of the provisions of the Constitution under which Congress raises armies; and

Whereas the Constitution provides, Article I, section 8, that the militia can be used only "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions": Therefore be it Resolved, etc., That an act (Public No. 12, 65th Cong., H. R. 3545) approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

LUNDEEN COAL RESOLUTION.

In the belief that the dangerous fuel situation had to be speedily met, I introduced the following resolution:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 143) directing the President to seize sufficient coal supplies for home consumption.

Whereas a serious shortage of coal supplies exists in the State of Minnesota and the Northwest; and

Whereas intense suffering and general paralysis of business in the Northwestern States during the winter months is inevitable unless a sufficient supply of coal is procured; and

Whereas a large proportion of coal for northwestern consumption must come via the Great Lakes and be unloaded on the docks at the head of the Lakes before the close of navigation; and
Whereas the Minnesota State Railroad and Warehouse Commission reports that soft-coal shortage at the docks at the head of the Lakes was 4,198,109 tons and hard-coal shortage 16,514 tons on July 16, 1917; and
Whereas the executive committee of the American Railway Association—that is, the special committee on railroad transportation cooperating with the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense—reports that 750,322 cars of coal were loaded during June, 1917, as compared with only 594,531 during June, 1916; and
Whereas a great supply of coal is thus shown to be moving and sufficient coal is produced in the United States to supply all home demands and still have a handsome surplus; and
Whereas the Congress has given the President ample power to protect the consumer of coal in Public No. 41, Sixty-fifth Congress (H. R. 4961); and
Whereas the people of Minnesota and the Northwest are not so much concerned with the coal supplies of foreign nations as they are about their own supply: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby directed to seize sufficient supplies of coal and hold the same within the continental and insular area of the United States for home consumption.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby directed to give the necessary orders to ship coal immediately into such of our States in which there is now a lack of supply, thus to avoid dire distress.

LUNDEEN FOOD RESOLUTION.

In the belief that the food situation was rapidly becoming dangerous to the average man and the laborer, who has but his wage to ward off the wolves, I introduced a food resolution for the consideration of Congress:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 158) directing the President to place an embargo upon such food supplies as are found necessary for home consumption and for the supply of our soldiers at home and abroad, and further directing the President, when necessary to the public welfare, to seize food supplies and apportion them among the people.

Whereas during the period of June 30, 1914, to June 30, 1917, the United States shipped food supplies valued at $3,212,321,312 to foreign ports, as against $1,352,146,068 during the corresponding period immediately preceding the world war; and
Whereas such depletion of our food stocks in favor of foreign nations has brought great hardship and intense suffering to the American people and resulted in numerous food riots in many American cities and industrial centers during the winter of 1916 and 1917; and
Whereas foreign commissions are continually calling upon us for more money and more food, and seek daily to shift their burdens upon America; and
Whereas the people of the United States are demanding that they be supplied first, and that foreign nations be given only out of our surplus, and insist now that it is high time that we adopt a permanent and fixed policy of America first, foreigners second; and
Whereas we produce far more food than is necessary for our own people, and the American people are willing to sell their entire surplus to nations now engaged in war upon our common enemy, and to such other nations as the President may direct; and
Whereas the entente allies, composing more than one-half of the earth, an overwhelming preponderance in men, money, and resources, are receiving wheat and many other food products at a less cost in Europe than in our own land where these products are produced; and
Whereas the history of human nature, selfishness, and greed would indicate that these nations will not call upon their final resources or drain their credit while we pour forth the treasures of America to the injury of the Republic; and
Whereas it is almost impossible for the laboring man and the average family to exist on the wage earned because of the high cost of living, and it is a fact that an underfed and undernourished people can not fight its best battle against a powerful foe and continue its struggle for complete economic independence; and
Whereas the Congress has given the President ample power to protect the people in the food-control law (Public act No. 41, 65th Cong., H. R. 4961): Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President be, and hereby is, directed to place an embargo upon such food supplies as are found necessary for home consumption and for the supply of our soldiers at home and abroad, and, when necessary to the public welfare, to seize food supplies and apportion them among the people.

EMPLOYMENT FOR DEMOBILIZED SOLDIERS AND WAR WORKERS.

Immediately after the signing of the armistice on November 11, 1918, I prepared the following House resolution No. 452, to instruct the great standing committees of Congress to survey the situation and to prepare legislation that would provide opportunities for employment for the millions of soldiers and war workers as fast as they were demobilized:

House resolution 452.

Whereas the rapid demobilization of 4,000,000 soldiers and 10,000,000 or more war workers in the United States during the next few months is liable to create a great body of unemployed; and
Whereas these conditions are brought about as a direct result of the exercise of the war-making power by Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the plain and imperative duty of Congress to at once initiate the necessary steps to open opportunities for employment to all workers in the United States who face enforced idleness during the coming months.

Resolved further, That as a first step to remedy the danger of widespread unemployment of millions of our people during the winter and following months, this House hereby authorizes and directs the Committees on Labor, Interstate Commerce, Public Buildings and Grounds, Rivers and Harbors, Naval Affairs, Military Affairs, District of Columbia, and Post Offices and Post Roads to each make an investigation as to the possibilities of work for the unemployed in those branches of industry, either in public or private employment, coming within the purview of each of the above committees of this House.

Said committees shall have power to subpœna witnesses and administer oaths, to send for persons and papers, and employ such assistants as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of this resolution, and to report to this House on or before February 10, 1919.

INDORSED BY REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

UNEMPLOYMENT DANGER FORESEEN BY REPRESENTATIVE LUNDEEN—NO ACTION TAKEN BY DEMOCRATS ON RESOLUTION TO PROVIDE WORK.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

One of the most pressing problems of the hour is that of employment, not only of the men who are being mustered out of service but also of the thousands who are being released from war work in factories, offices, and other institutions. Congressman LUNDEEN, Republican, from the Minneapolis district of Minnesota, is one of the men who early foresaw the menace of unemployment growing out of the sudden return of peace, and, in order that the matter might be properly and intelligently handled, he introduced a resolution directing Congress to take immediate steps to open up opportunities for employment to all workers in the United States in order that the danger of widespread idleness might not become a menace to the prosperity of the country and the stability of its institutions. His resolution provided for immediate investigation as to the possibilities of work in all branches of public industry, and directed the proper committees in the House of Representatives to make a survey of the various public industries, such as the construction and maintenance of highways, harbors, public buildings, and other like work.

Along with all other reconstruction measures, which have been proposed by Republican Congressmen, LUNDEEN'S resolution was referred to committee and since has not been heard of. The Democratic majority is perfectly satisfied to mark time and "wait for something to turn up."

Now that the danger of general unemployment is upon the country, due to lack of preparedness for peace by the Democratic administration, the Democrats are appealing to private interests and State and local governments to help them out of the difficulties into which their own indifference and incompetence have plunged the Nation.

BILL FOR BUREAU OF THE UNEMPLOYED.

The most troublesome question in all the civilized countries of the world to-day is the problem of the unemployed. As a help toward the solution of this question in the United States, on January 2, 1919, I introduced the following bill (H. R. 13592) to amend the Department of Labor law by providing for a really efficient bureau for the unemployed:

A bill (H. R. 13592) to amend an act entitled "An act to create a Department of Labor" by providing for a bureau of the unemployed.

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to create a Department of Labor," approved March 4, 1913, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding the following section:

"SEC. 12. That there shall be in the Department of Labor a bureau to be called the bureau of the unemployed, and a commissioner of the unemployed who shall be the head of the said bureau, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive a salary of $6,000 per annum. There shall also be in said bureau a deputy commissioner, who shall receive a salary of $4,000 per annum, and who shall, in the absence of the commissioner, act as and perform the duties of the commissioner of the unemployed, and who shall also perform such other duties as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of Labor or by the said commissioner.

"The said commissioner shall have power and authority under the direction of the Secretary of Labor—

"(a) To take a census, at as frequent intervals as possible, of the unemployed in the United States.

"(b) To make and keep a classified enrollment of the unemployed by vocations.

"(c) To correct and keep full records of the industrial and commercial conditions throughout the United States, especially in relation to opportunities for the employment of labor.

"(d) To furnish the fullest possible information to the unemployed of opportunities for employment in any part of the United States and to devise plans for facilitating the movement of the unemployed to places where opportunity for employment exists.

"(e) To make investigations and report to Congress and the President annually on the 1st of December, and oftener if requested, the extent of enforced idleness and unemployment in the United States and the causes thereof, with suggestions for remedies for the same."

RESOLUTION FOR IRISH FREEDOM.

Believing that the great principle of self-determination of peoples should be applied with broad and just impartiality to all countries, on December 2, 1918, about the time the peace conference was assembling in Paris, I introduced the following House joint resolution 354, instructing the United States delegates to the peace conference to demand freedom and self-determination for Ireland.

On the last day of the session of Congress the House, by a large majority, passed a resolution, thus requesting President Wilson and the American delegates to the peace conference to support the proposal for the recognition for the rights of Ireland:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 354) instructing the delegates to the peace conference to demand freedom for Ireland.

Whereas the President has declared in favor of freedom and self-determination for all peoples; and
Whereas the President has further declared that we went to war to make the world safe for democracy: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the delegates of the United States of America to the world peace conference be, and they hereby are, instructed to demand that the conference provide self-determination and freedom for Ireland.

RESOLUTION TO RETURN OUR SOLDIERS FROM RUSSIA.

Every American soldier must at once be returned from Russia to the United States. The President can not make war without a declaration of war by Congress.

House concurrent resolution 64.

Whereas thousands of American soldiers are now fighting in Russia; and
Whereas these Americans engaged in war upon the Russian Republic were conscripted to make war on the Empires of Germany and Austria; and

Whereas the President has declared in favor of self-determination for all nations and we are now permitting enemy nations to adjust their own internal affairs; and

Whereas the President on January 8, 1918, in his peace terms which laid down his 14 points declared in point 6 as follows:

"The evacuation of all Russian territory and such a settlement of all questions affecting Russia as will secure the best and freest cooperation of the other nations of the world in obtaining for her an unhampered and unembarrassed opportunity for the independent determination of her own political development and national policy and assure her of a sincere welcome into the society of free nations under institutions of her own choosing; and, more than a welcome, assistance also of every kind that she may need and may herself desire. The treatment accorded Russia by her sister nations in the months to come will be the acid test of their good will, of their comprehension of her needs as distinguished from their own interests, and of their intelligent and unselfish sympathy"; and

Whereas the State Department has made public no information as to the causes of war against Russia or the status thereof; and

Whereas the President has stated officially that America went to war to save democracy; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States has made no declaration of war against Russia: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be, and hereby is, instructed to withdraw at once all American troops now on Russian soil.

PRESIDENT INVADING RUSSIA WITHOUT AUTHORITY.

The press for March 11, 1919, states that our men are again in bloody struggle with Russia. The Government some time ago promised to return these men. Now we learn that they are still fighting for their lives. This double-crossing by the double-crossers who are now trying to function as officials is, to put it mildly, a dastardly outrage.

RESOLUTION TO END FOREIGN PROPAGANDA.

Believing that propaganda conducted in the United States by and in the interests of foreign Governments is derogatory to the welfare and best interests of the United States, I introduced the following House resolution 615 as a proper step toward the elimination of this reprehensible propaganda which has been conducted by both sets of European belligerents in the period immediately preceding the entrance of the United States into the war:

House resolution 615.

Whereas there are widespread charges that foreign propaganda has been and is being conducted in the United States for the purpose of influencing the people and Government of the United States; that this foreign influence is tainting the public press, ended our neutrality, hastened our entrance into the world war, and is now affecting problems growing out of the world war; that immense sums of money have been and are being expended to carry out said propaganda; that this propaganda is being conducted in a manner hostile to the best interests of our country and in the interest of foreign countries and munition profiteers, both foreign and domestic: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee, composed of nine Members of this House who have been reelected to the Sixty-sixth Congress, shall be appointed by the Speaker to inquire into the facts and report to the House in the Sixty-sixth Congress within 60 days of the date of its assembling.

Resolved further, That said committee is hereby empowered to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony, to send for persons and papers, and to employ such assistance as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution.

RESOLUTION FOR REPEAL OF THE ESPIONAGE-CENSORSHIP LAW.

I voted against the espionage-censorship bill and did so in accordance with my oath to support the Constitution, which provides in Article I of the amendments:

Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

I therefore introduced the following bill (H. R. 16199) to repeal the obnoxious espionage-censorship law, which is probably as offensive to the liberty-loving sensibilities of the American people as any act ever passed by Congress:

A bill (H. R. 16199) to repeal the espionage and censorship law.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of June 15, 1917, and amendments thereto, known as the espionage and censorship law (Public act No. 24), be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

BILL FOR ELIMINATION OF PRIVATE PROFIT IN WAR MUNITIONS.

From a study of the conditions preceding the world war, I am convinced that that unparalleled disaster was largely inflicted on mankind through the machinations of the private individual and corporate owners of munitions plants whose aim was to make money profit out of war. To help prevent and eliminate such malign influence from our affairs in the future, I introduced a bill (H. R. 16204) to provide for Government ownership and control of the manufacture and sale of all weapons and munitions of war:

A bill (H. R. 16204) to provide for Government ownership and control of the manufacture and sale of all weapons and munitions of war.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after one year from the date of the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for private individuals or corporations to manufacture or sell any weapons or munitions of war, or build or equip any vessels of war, except in an emergency for the United States and under a license granted by the Government of the United States: Provided, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are hereby authorized and directed when making settlement of contracts with private individuals and corporations for unfinished war materials in accordance with the act of February 28, 1919, to salvage wherever possible from such contracts such unfinished materials, buildings, machinery, or plants as may be useful to the Government now or in the future for the manufacture of weapons and war materials in its own plants, to the end that wherever possible private profit shall be eliminated from the business of war.

BILL TO AMELIORATE EXCESSIVE COURTS-MARTIAL PENALTIES.

I heartily favored the Claypool bill to provide some amelioration of the cruel hardship and gross injustice of the courts-martial penalties which were inflicted on large numbers of our soldiers by officers often wholly unfit to exercise any judicial function. The excessive fines of these petty offenders, often confiscatory of the soldiers' small pay for many months, should now be returned to them.

FOR REDUCTION OF MOVING-PICTURE THEATER TAX.

About two days before the close of the final session of the Sixty-fifth Congress the majority in the Ways and Means Committee and in the House passed a joint resolution amending the revenue law of 1918—which had only been signed by the President three or four days before—striking out section 904 of the revenue act, which was commonly known as the "luxury tax," the one section of the bill which was to be levied directly on the luxuries of the rich. I immediately, on March 3, 1919, introduced the following House joint resolution 422 to repeal section 906 of the revenue act, which would have reduced the tax on films and moving pictures, thus relieving the poor man's principal place of amusement for himself, his wife, and children of one of the heaviest taxes of the revenue bill. I believed this was but fair as an accompaniment to the repeal of the rich man's luxury tax:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 442) to repeal section 906 of the revenue act of 1918, approved February 24, 1919.

Resolved, etc., That section 906 of the revenue act of 1918 is hereby repealed.

BILL CREATING UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AIR SERVICE.

The navigation of the air is the newest field just now fairly opened up to the enterprise of men and nations. In order that our people may take their proper place and share in the development of this new science, I introduced the following bill (H. R. 16195) to create an executive department of the United States Government to be known as the department of air service. Other nations are making rapid strides in this field, and in the rivalry of securing the benefits, commercial and otherwise, from this new form of navigation I believe such a department will be a great benefit to the Government and the people of the United States:

A bill (H. R. 16195) to create a department of air service.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created an executive department in the Government to be called the department of air service and a secretary of air service, who shall be the head thereof and who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum, and whose tenure of office shall be like that of the heads of the other executive departments; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include such department, and the provisions of title 4 of the Revised Statutes, including all amendments thereto, are hereby made applicable to said department. The purpose of the department of air service shall be to promote, develop, and regulate the navigation of the air for the benefit of the people and the Government of the United States. The said secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the said department of such device as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken of the said seal.

SEC. 2. That there shall be in said department an assistant secretary of air service, to be appointed by the President, who shall receive a salary of $7,500 a year. He shall perform such duties as shall be prescribed by the secretary or required by law. There shall also be one chief clerk and a disbursing clerk, and such other clerical assistants, inventors, inspectors, experts, scientists, and special agents as may from time to time be provided for by Congress. The auditor for the State and other departments shall receive and examine all accounts of salaries and incidental expenses of the office of the secretary of air service and of all bureaus and offices under his direction, and all accounts relating to all other business within the jurisdiction of the department of air service, and certify the balances arising thereon to the division of bookkeeping and warrants and send forthwith a copy of each certificate to the secretary of air service.

SEC. 3. That the following-named officers, bureaus, divisions, and branches of the public service now and heretofore under the War Department and all that pertains to the same, known as the Chief of the Aircraft Production Bureau, and the Aircraft Production Bureau and the military air stations, the Chief of the Bureau of Aviation, and the Bureau of Aviation of the Navy Department and the naval air stations, be, and the same hereby are, transferred from the War Department and Navy Department to the Department of Air Service, and the same shall hereafter remain under the jurisdiction and supervision of the last-named department.

SEC. 4. That the official records and papers now on file in and pertaining exclusively to the business of any bureau, office, department, or branch of the public service in this act transferred to the Department of Air Service, together with the furniture and apparatus now in use in such bureau, office, department, or branch of the public service shall be, and hereby are, transferred to the Department of Air Service.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Air Service shall have charge in the buildings or premises occupied by or appropriated to the Department of Air Service, of the library, furniture, fixtures, records, and other property pertaining to it or hereafter required for use in its business. He shall be allowed to expend for the purchase of buildings, materials, machinery, vehicles, vessels, and apparatus required for the operations of the air service in promoting, developing, and regulating the navigation of the air, and for periodicals and for the purposes of the library and for rental of appropriate quarters for the accommodation of the Department of Air Service within the District of Columbia, and for all other incidental expenses, such sums as Congress may provide from time to time: Provided, however, That where any office, bureau, or branch of the public service transferred to the Department of Air Service by this act is occupying rented buildings or premises it may still continue to do so until other suitable quarters are provided for its use: And provided further, That all officers, clerks, and employees now employed in any of the bureaus, offices, departments, or branches of the public service in this act transferred to the Department of Air Service are each and all hereby transferred to said department at their present grades and salaries, except where otherwise provided in this act: And provided further, That all laws prescribing the work and defining the duties of the several bureaus, offices, departments, or branches of the public service by this act transferred to and made a part of the Department of Air Service shall, so far as the same are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, remain in full force and effect, to be executed under the direction of the Secretary of Air Service.

SEC. 6. That there shall be a solicitor of the Department of Justice for the department of air service, whose salary shall be $5,000 per annum.

SEC. 7. That all duties performed and all power and authority now possessed or exercised by the head of any executive department in and over any bureau, office, officer, board, branch, or division of the public service by this act transferred to the department of air service, or any business arising therefrom or pertaining thereto, or in relation to the duties performed by and authority conferred by law upon such bureau, officer, office, board, branch, or division of the public service, whether of an appellate or revisory character or otherwise, shall hereafter be vested in and exercised by the head of the said department of air service.

SEC. 8. That the secretary of air service shall annually, at the close of each fiscal year, make a report in writing to Congress, giving an account of all moneys received and disbursed by him and his department and describing the work done by the department. He shall also, from time to time, make such special investigations and reports as he may be required to do by the President, or by Congress, or which he himself may deem necessary.

SEC. 9. That the secretary of air service shall investigate and report to Congress a plan of coordination of the activities, duties, and powers of the office of the secretary of air service with the activities, duties, and powers of the present bureaus, commissions, and departments, so far as they relate to the air service and the navigation of the air, in order to harmonize and unify such activities, duties, and powers with a view to further legislation, to further define the duties and powers of such department of air service.

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect from and after the date of its passage, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

MAYOR VAN LEAR, OF MINNEAPOLIS, APPROVES.

CITY OF MINNEAPOLIS,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
March 22, 1918.

Mr. ERNEST LUNDEEN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND LUNDEEN: I received your wire of March 20 advising me that the working people can depend on you to help fight their battle in Congress. It is pleasing to know that one like yourself, who has always stood in the forefront of the battle in our State legislature to make better wages and better living conditions for the common people, is still keeping up the good work in Congress.

I felt sure that you would favor conscription of wealth to pay for the war, as I knew that your life work in behalf of the toilers would make you see this great crisis in the right light. I felt that we of organized labor could depend upon you when the test came and when the common people were to give freely of the lives of their sons, and that you would not put the dollars of the war profiteers above the lives of our children.

Your career in Congress has been watched by me with interest, and I am pleased to note that the Congressman from our district has been found always standing foursquare in the interest of the common people.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours, very truly,

THOMAS VAN LEAR, Mayor.

REFERENDUM ON LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Pursuant to the principle that the people themselves should, in a democratic Republic like ours, at all times exercise the largest possible measure of direct control over their Government, especially on all large and important measures, I introduced the following bill (H. R. 16219) to provide for an advisory referendum vote of the people of the United States on the proposed league of nations:

A bill (H. R. 16219) to provide for an advisory referendum vote of the people of the United States on the proposed league of nations.

Be it enacted, etc., That the constitution and covenants of the proposed league of nations when presented to the United States for adoption shall first be submitted to an advisory referendum vote of the voters of all the States of the Union.

SEC. 2. That within not less than 30 nor more than 90 days after the presentation of the constitution of the said league of nations to the United States the Secretary of State is hereby empowered and directed to call a special election of all the qualified electors in each State for registering their approval or disapproval of the said league of nations.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized and directed to print and furnish to the people of each State through the State governments the necessary copies (one for each citizen) of the proposed constitution of the league of nations and the ballots and election papers for said election. All costs of the aforesaid referendum election shall be paid by the Government of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the regular election officers of each State shall have charge of the polling of the votes and the conduct of the election in accordance with the forms and laws of each of the several States.

SEC. 5. That a joint committee of 30 members (15 Members of the House and 15 Members of the Senate), of which the Vice President of the United States shall be ex officio chairman, shall act as a final board of canvassers to determine and announce the result of the said referendum election.

SEC. 6. That the governor of each State shall transmit to the Vice President, acting as chairman of the aforesaid joint committee of Congress, at Washington, D. C., the official returns of the election in his State within 30 days after the date of holding said election; and not less than 30 days later the aforesaid joint committee of Congress shall announce the result of the election for the entire United States.

Gentlemen of the Congress, we stand in the midst of a world crisis. All is confusion worse confounded. We are entangled here, there, and everywhere. My last word to you, my fellow citizens, is this: Turn again reverently to the pages of America's glorious history. Read and read again the admonitions of the fathers of the Republic. You will find there words of wisdom and a sure compass with which to chart your course. And having read, stand upon the watchtowers of the Nation and solemnly guard America, our motherland.

Concurrent Resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota Favoring the Establishment of a League of Nations to Enforce Peace.

HON. GEORGE M. YOUNG,
OF NORTH DAKOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, following is a copy of a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, certified to by Hon. Thomas Hall, secretary of state, favoring the establishment of a league of nations to enforce peace and to promote the liberty, progress, and orderly development of the world:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Thomas Hall, secretary of state for the State of North Dakota, do hereby set forth and certify that the following is the full text and the whole thereof of a certain concurrent resolution adopted by the Sixteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota.

Dated at the capitol in Bismarck, N. Dak., this 3d day of March, 1919.

[SEAL.] THOMAS HALL,
Secretary of State.

Concurrent resolution favoring the establishment of a league of nations to enforce peace and aim at promoting the liberty, progress, and orderly development of the world.

Whereas the war, now brought to a victorious close by the associated power of the free nations of the world, was above all else a war to end war and protect human rights: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of North Dakota (the House of Representatives concurring), That we favor the establishment of a league of nations of which the United States shall be a member. We believe that such a league should aim at promoting the liberty, progress, and orderly development of the world; that it should clinch the victory won at such terrible sacrifice by having the united potential force of all its members as a standing menace against any nation that seeks to upset the peace of the world; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be sent by the secretary of state to the President and to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to each of the United States Senators and Representatives from the State of North Dakota.

America First.

OF
HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
OF MINNESOTA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Monday, March 3, 1919.

The House had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 357) requesting the commissioners plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the international peace conference to present to the said conference the right of Ireland to freedom, independence, and self-determination.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, Irish independence has agitated world politics for more than seven centuries. Americans of Irish descent can not be blamed for their ardent desire to free the land of their fathers at a time when the world moves in favor of self-determination for all peoples. I do not believe that Mr. Wilson is in favor of freedom for all peoples; his statement to the Irish-American committee the other day shows plainly that he opposed Irish independence. At all times I have followed the advice of Washington in his Farewell Address—that of avoiding the wiles, intrigues, and entangling alliances of Europe. The Nation, under the leadership of Mr.

Wilson, has—temporarily, I hope—abandoned the policy of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and the long line of Presidents who followed Washington. Is this man wiser than all of these?

If we are to discuss self-determination for all peoples of the world, I take it that all the world includes Ireland.

On December 2, 1918, I introduced the following joint resolution (H. J. Res. 354), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

Joint resolution instructing the delegates to the peace conference to demand freedom for Ireland.

Whereas the President has declared in favor of freedom and self-determination for all peoples; and

Whereas the President has further declared that we went to war to make the world safe for democracy: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the delegates of the United States of America to the world peace conference be, and they hereby are, instructed to demand that the conference provide self-determination and freedom for Ireland.

This was the first resolution introduced to instruct our peace delegates to fight for Irish freedom, and the House of Representatives passed a resolution so instructing the delegates to the world peace conference.

The Polish, the Czecho-Slav, the Jugo-Slav, the Austro-Italian, the Armenian, and whatnot questions are now no more to the front, nor do they outrank in any manner the great question of Irish independence.

The Irish question opens up our whole international policy.

In foreign affairs the Wilson administration has again and again made the interests of America secondary to those of foreign nations.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON.

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world. (Washington's Farewell Address.)

I am for America first. The man who cares not for his own is worse than an infidel. Embarked on the stormy seas of time, we must keep our own ship afloat. We must prevent any member of the crew from scuttling the ship. We must preserve our own civilization. The polestar of safety is the foreign policy of Washington, Hamilton, and Jefferson.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON.

Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice? (Washington's Farewell Address.)

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

Peace and abstinence from European interferences are our objects. (From a letter from Thomas Jefferson to M. Du Pont de Nemours, April, 1802.)

The welfare of his country is the first consideration of a good citizen. From this point of view the citizen meets and solves the problems of the hour. Petty politicians and small statesmen may seek to better their interests at the expense of the Nation, but the citizen who has grasped the essentials of citizenship places his country's welfare above the interests of the individual. Not only must his interests be subordinate to the Nation's interests, but the interests of every other nation or combination of nations must be subordinate thereto. Thus only can a nation exist. For us there can be but one motto, one aim, and one purpose, and that is America first. No cloud must be allowed to obscure this principle; no alliance or allegiance must endanger it.

Editors with pens poisoned by interested foreign powers and dominated by proforeign officials have done their best to overthrow this principle enunciated by the great Washington. They have succeeded in blinding but a minority. The great mass of Americans to-day are in hearty accord with Washington's Farewell Address and his policy of avoiding foreign entanglements, his policy of America first. Many to-day, and among them men whom the people have placed in the highest offices, seem anxious to abandon the foreign policy outlined by our first President and carefully followed by our greatest statesmen. They would leave the path trodden by Washington and Hamilton, Jefferson and Jackson, Madison and Monroe, and that great American, Lincoln; they would go in new and strange paths; they term the fathers of the Republic back numbers; they ignore their writings as documents too musty to examine.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON.

My policy has been, and will continue to be while I have the honor to remain in the administration, to maintain friendly terms with but to be independent of all the nations of the earth. (Letter from Washington to Gouverneur Morris, Dec. 22, 1795.)

I believe it is the sincere wish of united America to have nothing to do with the political intrigues or the squabbles of European nations. (Letter from Washington to the Earl of Buchan, dated Philadelphia, Apr. 22, 1793.)

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

Do what is right, leaving the people of Europe to act their follies and crimes among themselves, while we pursue in good faith the paths of peace and prosperity. (From a letter from Thomas Jefferson to President Monroe, June, 1823.)

Determined as we are to avoid if possible wasting the energies of our people in war and destruction, we shall avoid implicating ourselves with the powers of Europe, even in the support of principles which we mean to pursue. (From a letter from Thomas Jefferson to Thomas Paine, Mar. 18, 1801.)

PRESIDENT MONROE.

Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers. (From President Monroe's message to Congress, delivered on Dec. 2, 1823.)

The United States is now facing disaster as a result of the complications arising out of the world war. What the people demand is a continued and steadfast adherence to the policy of the past 140 years. The election of 1918 proved that their policy was the policy of Washington, the policy of America first.

In that election Woodrow Wilson demanded support for his foreign policy and was emphatically repudiated. It is our leaders who are suffering from blindness—or illusions; they are still stumbling in darkness, led on by the mirage of vain theories which have swept them off their feet. Our leaders to-day need to be educated—in the teachings of the past. Their false leadership will not cause the Nation to perish, and when oblivion has obscured the false prophets the Republic will still survive.

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON.

I hope that the United States of America will be able to keep disengaged from the labyrinth of European politics. (Letter of Washington to Sir Edward Newenham, July 17, 1787.)

In these evil days America must be first in our thought, first in our hearts, and war must be avoided in every honorable way—its terrible consequences and sacrifices must not lightly be forced upon a great people. War should never be declared without a vote of the people upon the declaration.

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

We wish not to meddle with the internal affairs of any country, nor with the general affairs of Europe. (From a letter of Thomas Jefferson to C. W. F. Dumas, 1793.)

PRESIDENT JACKSON.

Our best wishes on all occasions, our good offices when required, will be afforded to promote the domestic tranquillity and foreign peace of all nations with whom we have any intercourse. Any intervention in their affairs further than this, even by the expression of an official opinion, is contrary to our principles of international policy, and will always be avoided. (From the fourth annual message of Andrew Jackson, Dec. 4, 1832.)

We should follow the wise counsel of Washington and in all our foreign relations adhere strictly to absolute and impartial neutrality. Private profit must be eliminated from war. Gold must not be coined out of patriotism. Our Government must own and control the munition plants. War will then be far less likely. My bill H. R. 16204 provides for Government ownership of munition plants.

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

America has a hemisphere to itself. It must have its separate system of interests, which must not be subordinated to those of Europe. (From letter of Thomas Jefferson to Baron von Humboldt, December, 1813.)

If you want to put an end to nine-tenths of all wars, let the people vote on war. Nearly all wars are brought on by the rulers of nations. Their eyes are fixed on the rainbow of military glory; they want a place in history; for them humanity and civilization sink into the background. The peoples of the earth will soon seize the right to vote on war. We shall then see the beginning of a new day.

PRESIDENT GRANT.

As the United States is the freest of all nations, so, too, its people sympathize with all people struggling for liberty and self-government, but while so sympathizing, it is due to our honor that we shall abstain from enforcing our views upon unwilling nations and from taking an interested part, without invitation, in the quarrels between different nations or between governments and their subjects. (From the first annual message of President U. S. Grant, delivered Dec. 6, 1869.)

Forget this "Make the world safe for democracy," and say to all men, "We are trying here in America to produce a democracy that will be an example to the world." There never was a greater piece of bunko foisted upon the American people than this that we went to war to make the world safe for democracy. The soldiers on the field laugh at it. If we went to war for anything it was to vindicate our rights upon the sea.

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

The less we have to do with the amities or enmities of Europe the better. (Letter from Thomas Jefferson to Thomas Leiper, 1815.)

The European nations constitute a separated division of the globe; their localities make them part of a distinct system; they have a set of interests of their own in which it is our business never to engage ourselves. (From letter of Thomas Jefferson to Baron von Humboldt, December, 1813.)

PRESIDENT JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Reasoning upon this state of things from the sound and judicious principles of Washington, must we not say that the period which he predicted was then not far off has arrived; that America has a set of primary interests which have none, or a remote, relation to Europe; that the interference of Europe, therefore, in those concerned should be spontaneously withheld by her upon the same principles that we have never interfered with hers? (From President John Quincy Adams's message to Congress, Mar. 15, 1826.)

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

I know that it is a maxim with us, and I think it a wise one, not to entangle ourselves with the affairs of Europe. (Letter of Thomas Jefferson to E. Carrington in 1787.)

It ought to be the very first object of our pursuit to have nothing to do with European interests and politics. (Letter of Thomas Jefferson to Thomas Paine, Mar. 18, 1801.)

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON.

An energetic General Government must prevent the several States from involving themselves in the political disputes of the European powers. (From letter of Washington to Thomas Jefferson, dated Jan. 1, 1788.)

All through his administration Mr. Wilson has bulldozed the Sixty-fifth Congress in a most shameful and brutal manner. He steam-rollered his un-American foreign policies through the House and the Senate under the threat of war and the conduct of war. Congress abjectly surrendered, with only occasional and weak protests. My hope is that the Sixty-sixth Congress will show some nerve and backbone.

PRESIDENT MADISON.

To cherish peace and friendly intercourse with all nations having corresponding dispositions; to maintain sincere neutrality toward belligerent nations; to prefer in all cases amicable discussion and reasonable accommodation of differences to a decision of them by an appeal to arms; to exclude foreign intrigues and foreign partialities, so degrading to all countries and so baneful to free ones; to foster a spirit of independence too just to invade the rights of others, too proud to surrender our own, too liberal to indulge in unworthy prejudices ourselves, and too elevated not to look down upon them in others * * * as far as sentiments and intentions such as these can aid the fulfillment of my duty they will be a resource which can not fail me. (From the first inaugural address of James Madison.)

PRESIDENT WASHINGTON.

Separated as we are by a world of water from other nations, if we are wise we shall surely avoid being drawn into the labyrinth of their politics and involved in their destructive wars. (From a letter by Washington to the Chevalier de la Lucerne, Feb. 7, 1788.)

The American Army in Europe, after two sad years of experience, has come to the conclusion that Washington was right.

"SO THIS IS GERMANY."

In Europe racial prejudices are a stone wall to progress. Every war leaves bitterness and wounds which lead finally to another. It is a vicious circle, without any end in sight. From a purely American standpoint George Washington was right about "no entangling alliances." The officers in our Army are unanimous in declaring that the less we mix up in international affairs on this side of the water the better off we shall be. We have not the same purposes, we have not the same aspirations, we have not even the same ideals. Though of the same blood as the older races, we are yet a vastly different breed.

In a speech in the House of Representatives in 1848 Abraham Lincoln said:

Gen. Taylor in his Allison letter says: "Upon the subject of the tariff, the currency, the improvement of our great highways, rivers, lakes, and harbors the will of the people, as expressed through their Representatives in Congress, ought to be respected and carried out by the Executive."

Now, this is the whole matter—in substance it is this: The people say to Gen. Taylor, "If you are elected shall we have a national bank?" He answers, "Your will, gentlemen; not mine." "What about the tariff?" "Say yourselves." "Shall our rivers and harbors be improved?" "Just as you please. If you desire a bank, an alteration of the tariff, internal improvements, any or all, I will not hinder you; if you do not desire them, I will not attempt to force them on you. Send up your Members of Congress from the various districts with opinions according to your own, and if they are for these measures, or any of them, I shall have nothing to oppose; if they are not for them, I shall not, by any appliances whatever, attempt to dragoon them into their adoption."

We see it, and to us it appears like principle, and the best sort of principle at that—the principle of allowing the people to do as they please with their own business. My friend from Indiana (Mr. C. B. Smith) has aptly asked, "Are you willing to trust the people?" Some of you answered, substantially, "We are willing to trust the people; but the President is as much the representative of the people as Congress." In a certain sense and to a certain extent he is the representative of the people. He is elected by them, as well as Congress is. But can he, in the nature of things, know the wants of the people as well as 300 other men coming from all the various localities of the Nation? If so, where is the propriety of having a Congress? That the Constitution gives the President a negative on legislation all know; but that this negative should be so combined with platforms and other appliances as to enable him, and in fact almost compel him, to take the whole of legislation into his own hands is what we object to, is what Gen. Taylor objects to, and is what constitutes the broad distinction between you and us. To thus transfer legislation is clearly to take it from those who understand with minuteness the interest of the people and give it to one who does not and can not so well understand it.

PRESIDENT FILLMORE.

Hence it becomes an imperative duty not to interfere in the government or internal policy of other nations; and although we sympathize with the unfortunate or the oppressed everywhere in the struggles for freedom our principles forbid us from taking any part in such foreign contests. (From the first annual message of Millard Fillmore, delivered on Dec. 2, 1850.)

PRESIDENT MONROE.

Separated as we are from Europe by the great Atlantic Ocean, we can have no concern in the wars of the European Governments nor in the causes which produce them. (From the eighth annual message of James Monroe, delivered Dec. 7, 1824.)

PRESIDENT JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

* * * It will be seen that the United States neither intend nor are expected to take part in any deliberations of a belligerent character; that the motive of their attendance is neither to contract alliances nor to engage in any undertaking or project importing hostility to any other nation. (From the message to the Senate by John Quincy Adams, delivered Dec. 26, 1825.)

PRESIDENT TYLER.

An interference of one in the affairs of another is the fruitful cause of family disputes, and the same affects the peace, happiness, and prosperity of the States. It may be most devoutly hoped that the good sense of the American people will ever be ready to repel all such attempts should they ever be made. (From the fourth annual message of John Tyler, delivered Dec. 3, 1844.)

Make America safe for democracy. America can never be made safe for democracy until our high-handed, autocratic billionaires are tamed by the power of the people.

Our giant corporate monopolies not only scheme to levy tribute on every American citizen, but they want to exploit and enslave the peoples of other nations, and then use the Army and Navy of the United States to enable them to collect the profits of their foreign commercial conquests.

PRESIDENT VAN BUREN.

A rigid and persevering abstinence from all interference with the domestic and political relations of other States, alike due the genius and character of our Government and to the principle by which it is directed, a faithful observance in the management of our foreign relations, the practice of speaking plainly, dealing justly, and requiring peace and justice in return, as the best conservatives of the peace of nations. (From the fourth annual message of Martin Van Buren, delivered Dec. 5, 1840.)

PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

In this unusual agitation we have forborne from taking part in any controversy between foreign states and between parties or factions in such states. We have attempted no propagandism and acknowledge no revolution. But we have left to every nation the exclusive conduct and management of its own affairs. (Second message of President Lincoln, Dec. 1, 1862.)

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

Peace, commerce, and honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none, I deem (one of the) essential principles of our Government, and consequently (one) which ought to shape its administration. (From Thomas Jefferson's first inaugural address, Mar. 4, 1801.)

In a speech in North Dakota during the presidential campaign of 1912, I said:

Woodrow Wilson, though he has been governor of trust-ridden New Jersey, has signally failed to curb or even attempt to curb the trusts and monopolies in that State—the home and haven of about 90 per cent of all the monopolistic combines in this country.

During the six years that he has been President, Mr. Wilson, through the exercise of what Abraham Lincoln condemned in a speech in Congress in 1848 as "the appliances which enable him (the President) to take the whole of legislation into his own hands," has autocratically controlled the action of the Government in both the legislative and executive branches. With full power in his hands and those of his Attorney General to put an end to every robber trust in the country, he sat there for six years and allowed the robbery of the people by the trusts to continue without any hindrance from him. In the meantime he has by the misuse of usurped power and "appliances" diverted the activities of our Government into most questionable foreign entanglements—his two little wars in Mexico, without the authority of Congress, which the Constitution requires him to have before making war, the great war in Europe, the war of invasion against our sister Republic, Russia, again without the authority of Congress to act, and now his astounding temporary personal transfer of the executive branch of our Government to a foreign capital more than 3,000 miles across the sea, in order that he may personally participate in a secret diplomatic conference with foreign princes, potentates, and powers, one of the avowed objects of which is to bind as far as he can the people and Government of the United States to a new alliance with foreign nations far more entangling than those against which Washington and his successors for over a hundred years have so solemnly and earnestly warned us. Woodrow Wilson pursues an un-American policy, a foreign-minded and dangerous policy. If we would save the Republic we must halt him in his madness.

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

For us to attempt, by war, to reform all Europe, and bring them back to principles of morality and a respect for the equal rights of nations, would show us only to be maniacs. (Third annual message, Thomas Jefferson.)

WE SHOULD PROTEST.

(By Ella Wheeler Wilcox.)

To sit in silence when we should protest
Makes cowards out of men. The human race
Has climbed on protest. Had no voice been raised Against injustice, ignorance, and lust,
The Inquisition yet should serve the law,
And guillotines decide our least disputes.
The few who dare must speak and speak again
To right the wrongs of many. Speech, thank God,
No vested power in this great day and land
Can gag or throttle. Press and voice may cry
Loud disapproval of existing ills;
May criticize oppression and condemn
The lawlessness of wealth-protecting laws,
That let the children and child bearers toil
To purchase ease for idle millionaires.
Therefore, I do protest against the boast
Of independence in this mighty land,
Call no chain strong which holds one rusted link.
Call no land free that holds one fettered slave.
Until the manacled slim wrists of babes
Are loosed to toss in childish sport and glee;
Until the mother bears no burden save
The precious one beneath her heart; until
God's soil is rescued from the clutch of greed,
And given back to labor, let no man
Call this the land of freedom.

PRESIDENT PIERCE.

The conditions of States is not unlike individuals. They are mutually dependent upon each other. Amicable relations between them and reciprocal good will are essential for the promotion of whatever is desirable in their moral, social, and political condition. Hence it has been my earnest endeavor to maintain peace and friendly intercourse with all nations. (From the second annual message of President Franklin Pierce, delivered Dec. 4, 1854.)

PRESIDENT FILLMORE.

We make no warrants * * * to maintain any theory of a balance of power. (From the first annual message of Millard Fillmore, delivered Dec. 2, 1850.)

PRESIDENT JACKSON.

Nor have we less reason to felicitate ourselves on the position of our political than of our commercial concerns. They remain in * * * a state of prosperity and peace, the effect of a wise attention to the parting advice of the revered Father of his Country * * * to cultivate free commerce and honest friendship with all nations, but to make entangling alliances with none. (From the fourth annual message of Andrew Jackson, delivered Dec. 4, 1832.)

PRESIDENT JOHN ADAMS.

I do not love to be entangled in the quarrels of Europe. I do not wish to be under obligations to any of them, and I am very unwilling they should rob us of the glory of vindicating our own liberties. (From a letter by John Adams to James Warren, Apr. 27, 1777.)

In preparing the project of a treaty to be proposed by Congress to France, in the year 1776, fully apprised of the importance of neutrality, I prescribe to myself as a rule to admit nothing which could compromise the United States in any future wars of Europe. (President John Adams to the inhabitants of Bridgetown, N. J., May 1, 1798.)

Republics are always divided in opinion concerning forms of governments and plans and details of administration. These divisions are generally harmless, often salutary, and seldom very hurtful, except when foreign nations interfere, and by their art and agents excite and ferment them into parties and factions. Such interference and influence must be resisted and exterminated, or it will end in America, as it did anciently in Greece, and in our own time in Europe, in our total destruction as a republican Government and independent power. (John Adams to the citizens of Baltimore, May 2, 1798.)

The wise and prudent measures adopted by my predecessor to pursue and support a fair and impartial neutrality with the belligerent powers of Europe coinciding with my own opinions and principles, more ancient than the birth of the United States, could not but be heartily approved and supported by me during his whole administration and steadily pursued until this time. (John Adams to the inhabitants of Bridgetown, N. J., May 1, 1798.)

PRESIDENT GRANT.

We were asked by the new Government to use our good offices, jointly with those of European powers, in the interests of peace. Answer was made that the established policy and the true interests of the United States forbade them to interfere in European questions jointly with European powers. (From the second annual message of U. S. Grant, delivered Dec. 5, 1870.)

PRESIDENT POLK.

The great results which have been developed and brought to light by this war will be of immeasurable importance in the future progress of our country. They will tend powerfully to preserve us from foreign collisions and to enable us to pursue uninterruptedly our cherished policy of "peace with all nations, entangling alliances with none." (From fourth annual message of James K. Polk, delivered Dec. 5, 1848.)

It is well known to the American people and to all nations that this Government has never interfered with the relations subsisting between other Governments. * * * We have not sought their territories by conquest; we have not mingled with parties in their domestic troubles, and, believing our own form of government to be the best, we have never attempted to propagate it by intrigues, by diplomacy, or by force. (From the first annual message of James K. Polk, delivered Dec. 2, 1845.)

PRESIDENT JACKSON.

Our best wish on all occasions, our good offices when required, will be afforded to promote the domestic tranquillity and foreign peace of all nations with whom we have any intercourse. Any intervention in their affairs further than this, even by the expression of an official opinion, is contrary to our principles of international policy and will always be avoided. (From the fourth annual message of Andrew Jackson, delivered Dec. 4, 1832.)

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON.

If we weather the present storm, I hope we shall avail ourselves of the calm of peace to place our foreign connections under a new and different arrangement * * *. As to everything except commerce, we ought to divorce ourselves from them all. (From the Writings of Thomas Jefferson, Ford edition, to Edward Rutledge, June 24, 1797.)

PRESIDENT POLK.

Our country stands higher in the respect of the world than at any former period. To continue to occupy this proud position it is only necessary to preserve peace and faithfully adhere to the great and fundamental principle of our foreign policy of noninterference in the domestic concerns of other nations. (From the fourth annual message of James K. Polk, President of the United States, delivered Dec. 5, 1848.)

PRESIDENT MONROE.

With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and we shall not interfere. (From President James Monroe's seventh annual message.)

PRESIDENT BUCHANAN.

To avoid entangling alliances has been the maxim of our policy ever since the days of Washington, and its wisdom no one will attempt to dispute. (From James Buchanan's inaugural address.)

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

Maintaining, as I do, the tenets of a line of precedents from Washington's day, which proscribe entangling alliances with foreign States, I do not favor a policy of acquisition of new and distant territory or the incorporation of remote interests with our own. (From Grover Cleveland's first annual message, delivered in Washington on Dec. 8, 1885.)

Not only the American Presidents and statesmen of the past but statesmen of the present day recognize the danger to America from entanglement in the struggles of greed and imperialism in which the nations of Europe are enmeshed.

William J. Bryan says:

If I know the sentiment of the American people, it is inconceivable that they should be willing to put the American Army and Navy at the command of an international council which would necessarily be controlled by European nations and allow that council to decide for us when we would go to war.

Of the greedy ones who promote war and profit by war Upton Sinclair, writer and reformer, who shocked the Nation with his exposure of the frightful oppression of its employees by the Beef Trust, says:

Billions upon billions of profits are being made out of this war, fortunes beyond telling and beyond belief are being piled up by the insiders of the Coal Trust, the Steel Trust, the Copper Trust, the Oil Trust, the Beef Trust, the Powder Trust. While your son and my son are dying in the trenches the owners of these gigantic profit machines are making 20, 40, sometimes as high as 80 per cent upon their capital stocks; and in most cases these stocks have been so watered that the true rate of profit is thousands of per cent on the original investments.

PRESIDENT JOHN ADAMS.

Congress will never adopt the right system of foreign affairs until they consider their interests as distinct and keep them separate from those of all other nations. (From a letter by John Adams to Arthur Lee, Apr. 12, 1783.)

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

If the balance of power is justly a cause for jealous anxiety among the Governments of the Old World and a subject for our absolute noninterference, none the less is an observance of the Monroe doctrine of vital concern to our people and their Government. (From the special message of President Grover Cleveland, delivered Dec. 17, 1895.)

Whatever may be the traditional sympathy of our countrymen as individuals with a people who seem to be struggling for larger autonomy and greater freedom, deepened, as such sympathy naturally must be, in behalf of our natives, yet the plain duty of their Government is to observe in good faith the recognized obligations of international relationship. (From the third annual message of Grover Cleveland (second administration), delivered Dec. 2, 1895.)

In his speech before Congress some months before the 1918 election, Mr. Wilson said:

* * * Politics is adjourned.

In his appeal to the voters a few days before the election of 1918, Mr. Wilson said:

If you have approved of my leadership and wish me to continue to be your unembarrassed spokesman in affairs at home and abroad, I earnestly beg that you will express yourselves unmistakably to that effect by returning a Democratic majority to both the Senate and House of Representatives.

Thus was politics adjourned.

Mr. Wilson was elected in 1912 by a minority, due to the split in the Republican Party. In 1914 the Democrats won with the cry, "War in the East, peace in the West, thank God for Wilson." In 1916 he was reelected under false pretenses with the cry, "He kept us out of war." Had the President at that time stated that he would recommend war against Germany he would have lost every State in the Union. Senator WATSON, in a speech delivered in Virginia, said this was "the basest betrayal ever perpetrated on the American people."

PRESIDENT MONROE.

Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers. (From the seventh annual message of James Monroe, delivered Dec. 2, 1823.)

PRESIDENT FILLMORE.

It has been the uniform policy of this Government from its foundation to abstain from all interference in the domestic affairs of other nations. During the terrific contest of nation against nation which succeeded the French Revolution we were enabled by the wisdom and firmness of President Washington to maintain our neutrality. (From the third annual message of Millard Fillmore, delivered Dec. 6, 1852.)

The sinking of the Lusitania occurred a year before the 1916 election. Nothing occurred between the election and the declaration of war to change the situation. The case was already made up by election time. The facts and data were in Mr. Wilson's hands, and yet he went before the people on the issue of staying out of the war. How he lives with his conscience is beyond me.

In the next election of 1918 he presented his case to the people for their approval. He asked that his policy abroad be indorsed and asked them so to express themselves. The people emphatically repudiated his entangling foreign war policy and returned a Republican majority of 41 to the House and most unexpectedly gave a Republican majority in the Senate.

If any man was emphatically repudiated in the 1918 election, that man was certainly Mr. Wilson.

Let him cease trumpeting the sentiments of America abroad. The majority of Americans repudiate Mr. Wilson. Let him cease dining and wining with kings and emperors. Picture this false Democrat dwelling in the great palace of Prince Murat in Paris. The other day some one said that Woodrow Wilson might well write a book entitled "Kings Who Have Met Me"; and it was well said, while Americans starve by the million in our great cities, with poverty, unemployment, and hunger on the increase, while our taxes mount higher and even higher, our President transfers the Capital of the United States to Europe, hobnobs with royalty, and betrays the policy of Washington. The wrath of the people has already buried the Democratic Party, and the wrath of the people will yet overtake Mr. Wilson.

PRESIDENT JOHN ADAMS.

It is, in short, the only possible means of securing to our country that peace, neutrality, impartiality, and indifference in European wars, which, in my opinion, we shall be unwise in the last degree if we do not maintain. (From a letter by John Adams to the Congress, Sept. 5, 1783.)

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

The history of our recent dealings with other nations and our peaceful relations with them at this time additionally demonstrate the advantage of consistently adhering to a firm but just foreign policy, free from envious or ambitious national schemes, and characterized by entire honesty and sincerity. (From the second annual message of Grover Cleveland (second administration), delivered Dec. 3, 1894.)

PRESIDENT JOHN ADAMS.

But my system was determined, and had been so for more than 20 years, that is, to enter into no alliance with any power in Europe. In case of war with England I would not enter into any alliance with France. In case of war with France I would not form any alliance with England. (From John Adams's correspondence, published in the Boston Patriot, Apr., 1809.)

We should have suspended our judgment and been as neutral and impartial between the parties in France as between the nations of Europe. (John Adams to the inhabitants of Providence, R. I., Apr. 30, 1798.)

It is bad enough when the rich and powerful daily defy the laws of the land, which the weak and poor are expected to implicitly obey; it is even worse when high officials of the Government itself defy and disobey the laws which they themselves have placed upon the statute books.

In 1913 the Sixty-second Congress passed an act which provided:

Hereafter the Executive shall not extend or accept any invitations to participate in any international congress, conference, or like event without first having specific authority of law to do so. (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 37, pt. 1; Public Laws, p. 913, ch. 149.)

President Wilson's two trips to Europe "to participate in the international congress" at Paris are a direct violation of this law. By virtue of his office under the Constitution as President he is a part of the lawmaking power of the United States. The proud boast of Americans in the past has been that ours is a Government of laws and not of men. How long will it remain so if the highest officers of the Government set other men an example of open violation of the law?

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND.

This incident and the events leading up to it signally illustrate the impolicy of entangling alliances with foreign powers. (From the first annual message of Grover Cleveland (second administration), delivered Dec. 4, 1893.)

PRESIDENT PIERCE.

It is the traditional and settled policy of the United States to maintain impartial neutrality during the wars which from time to time occur among the great powers of the world. (From the third annual message of President Franklin Pierce, Dec. 31, 1855.)

PRESIDENT FILLMORE.

To maintain a strict neutrality in foreign wars, to cultivate friendly relations, to reciprocate every noble and generous act, and to perform punctually and scrupulously every treaty obligation—these are the duties which we owe to other States. (From the first annual message of President Millard Fillmore, delivered Dec. 2, 1850.)

PRESIDENT POLK.

It has been my constant aim and desire to cultivate peace and commerce with all nations. Tranquillity at home and peaceful relations abroad constitute the true permanent policy of our country. (From the fourth annual message of President James K. Polk, delivered Dec. 5, 1848.)

PRESIDENT JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Among the inquiries which were thought entitled to consideration before the determination was taken to accept the invitation was that whether the measure might not have the tendency to change the policy hitherto invariably pursued by the United States of avoiding all entangling alliances and all unnecessary foreign connections. (From a message to the House of Representatives by John Quincy Adams, delivered Mar. 15, 1826.)

America should not support or adopt any scheme of foreign policy, whether in the form of treaty, alliance, or league, which binds the United States to help maintain or impair the territorial integrity or the social, economic, or political institutions of other countries.

The people of each nation should be free to work out their own destiny without dictation from other nations and without dictating to other nations how they should manage their own affairs.

These are the principles which I am firmly convinced furnish our people and our Government the safest and wisest rule of conduct in the present grave emergency. I have full faith that they are the principles approved by the great majority of my fellow citizens. Practically all the Presidents of the United States who have spoken on this subject from 1789 to 1913 have laid down the same principle as the settled rule and guide for America's foreign policy.

Let one people, one country, one flag, mean just that and nothing more. Let us act for ourselves. Let us perfect this haven of liberty. Let no man come into our midst with dreams of world power and world dominion. Let others rage; let cowards tremble; our freemen stand strong. Proclaim to the nations that we will not serve others; we will not yoke ourselves with kings; we will not stoop before Europeans. We have but one hope, one desire; in our own hearts we place America first.

America first! Write it across the skies! Proclaim it to all the world! Standing here in the midst of a world crisis, we renew our pledge to our own independence, to our own liberty. We defy those who strive to yoke us like oxen in a mill. We serve notice on all foreigners: Hands off our Government! You shall not command us! You shall not control America in this hour! You shall not sacrifice our honor to glut your ambition! You shall not crucify the American people upon a cross of kings!

Opposing tax exemption of Federal land-bank bonds because it impairs national credit; depreciates liberty bonds, causing losses to 20,000,000 patriotic investors; enables wealthy individuals and corporations to evade war taxes; increases taxes on those who can not escape taxation; increases the cost of living to all consumers.

OF

HON. LOUIS T. McFADDEN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, February 28, 1919.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a message from the Senate this morning announces that the Senate has passed S. 5512, an act to amend the Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916.

A similar measure as a House bill has been considered by the House Committee on Banking and Currency. After it had been fully explained by Farm Loan Commissioner Norris, and carefully considered in detail, the committee decided against reporting it. Additional aid in one form or another is asked for the Federal farm-loan system at every session of Congress. In 1918 we gave them a special appropriation of $200,000,000 to tide them over their temporary difficulties. Now they ask for a permanent revolving fund of $50,000,000 in this bill. Another heavy appropriation of nearly a quarter of a million was made for expenses last week. In addition to these, a provision in the war-risk insurance bill, Senate bill 5555, provides for piling up a reserve fund to be invested in Federal land-bank bonds. At every twist and turn of legislation we find attempts to raid the Public Treasury to help this system. The same questions will doubtless come before the next Congress, and I feel that Congress and the public should be advised in advance. The appropriation of a few hundred million dollars more or less is a trifle compared with the great losses which will perpetually continue from year to year if the present complete tax exemption of land-bank bonds is continued.

Mr. Speaker, I voted for the Federal farm-loan act when it was enacted nearly three years ago. I can therefore discuss it impartially now as a man friendly to the purposes intended, but skeptical as to many uneconomic and fallacious theories that were incorporated in it, causing enormous overhead expenses.

The most beautiful and beneficent plans for the improvement of the conditions of mankind when enacted into law and submitted to the test of practical life sometimes fail.

The circumstances and conditions at the time of their creation and application to affairs must determine the success or failure of all new laws. In a measure, all statutes applying new theories to financial and business life are experimental. The best intentioned legislation often produces unexpected and unfortunate results. One of the most important functions of every legislative body in every country is the amendment and repeal of existing laws which through error in conception or from change of conditions may require modification to best serve the purposes of the people for whom they were enacted.

I represent an agricultural district in the State of Pennsylvania. Naturally, in supporting measures in Congress, I am deeply considerate of their effects on the industries of my own locality as well as on the country at large. My district is the one once represented in this body by Galusha A. Grow, the father of the homestead law, and I desire to live up to its traditions. My duty requires that I faithfully represent all the people of my district—the wage earner, the business man, and the farmer. I owe a duty to the farmer who by thrift and economy has paid off his debts as much as to the man whose farm is only partly paid for.

During the sessions of the Sixty-fourth Congress, when the Federal farm-loan act was formed and perfected, I was a member of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, which had this act under consideration. When we were formulating the measure which subsequently became the law, every section and every line was most carefully considered and freely discussed. In fact, this law was not the result of the work of one session, but the growth of years of study and deliberation.

As the representative of an agricultural district, I was predisposed to favor the purposes of the bill. As the measure developed and assumed complete form during the deliberations of our committee and the several associated committees of the Senate and House, I became deeply interested in it and devoted my best efforts to its perfection and enactment. At that time I offered several amendments to the bill, which, had they been adopted, would, in my opinion, have strengthened the law and have prevented several difficulties that now confront the system.

It is not with the disposition of an enemy but as a friend that I now suggest amendments to the Federal farm-loan act, which in my judgment changed circumstances and conditions render not only desirable but imperative.

The subject of rural credits first received the formal consideration of the National Government in 1913, following several years of general agitation. The formal joint hearings of the subcommittees of the Committees on Banking and Currency of the Senate and House of Representatives were held early in 1914, several months before the world war began in Europe. The law was enacted in 1916, nearly a year before this country became involved in the great conflict.

In those days the prices of corn, wheat, cotton, hogs, and other farm products were not one-half of what they are to-day. Our national debt was too small to be considered, and income taxes were almost negligible and of no interest or import to 95 per cent of our citizens. Then the tax exemption of Federal land-bank bonds was a mere incidental provision of slight importance, and it received little consideration or attention.

Now all this is changed. Nearly everything is subject to war taxes. From chewing gum and candy to clothing, from postal rates to property inherited, from medicines to wages earned by work of hand or brain, a tribute must be paid to the national taxgatherer.

The Nation staggers under our enormous war debt of nearly $17,000,000,000. It is likely to be $25,000,000,000 and perhaps $30,000,000,000 before the costs of the war are all settled. Over 20,000,000 patriotic bondholders have lost over $800,000,000 by the depreciation of liberty bonds. It has been decided to be impossible to float another issue of long-time bonds, and Congress has found it necessary to give unusual powers to the Secretary of the Treasury that he may be enabled to borrow $5,000,000,000 on short-time notes.

Under this changed condition of affairs I consider it my duty as the representative of my district and as a Member of the Congress of the United States to favor the repeal of that part of the law which enables the owners of Federal land-bank bonds and of joint-stock land-bank bonds to evade the payment of their just and legal proportion of war taxes.

When the Federal Farm Loan System was created it was claimed that advantages would accrue to farmers from Government supervision and through management of the business without profit by the employment of salaried officials and subordinates.

The levying of a heavy income tax since the enactment of the act has entirely changed the result from that originally intended.

The Federal farm-loan act now enables persons receiving large incomes to evade their war taxes.

Misleading statements have led many people into the mistaken belief that these bonds are Government obligations. They are not Government obligations. There is not a single paragraph, line, or word in this law or any other law that makes the United States Government responsible for the payment of one cent of principal or interest of the bonds of Federal land banks or joint-stock land banks. In fact, because they are not obligations of the Government, a serious legal question is involved as to whether or not the Congress had the right to exempt them from taxation. Sooner or later the courts will be called on to decide that question. Persons receiving large incomes are willing to take chances because of the tax exemption. Those receiving incomes in excess of $28,000 per year under the new law are required to pay one-fourth of their income in taxes on the excess above $28,000. On the excess above $78,000 per year half of the income is required as an income tax.

The tax on incomes in excess of $1,000,000 is 77 per cent, of which 12 per cent is normal tax and 65 per cent is surtax. On $50,000 received from 5 per cent taxable securities the annual tax payable to the National Treasury by a person receiving an income in excess of $1,000,000 is $38,500. When such a millionaire owns Federal land-bank bonds or joint-stock land-bank bonds this amount is a total loss to the National Treasury, as such bonds are free from Federal, State, and local taxes.

On a $50,000 income received from liberty bonds held in excess of the exemption limit the same wealthy person would be required to pay an income tax of $32,500. Liberty bonds, except the first issue, are subject to the surtax.

This discrimination against liberty bonds and in favor of land-bank bonds results in a depreciation of liberty bonds.

Persons receiving small incomes may purchase a few tax-exempt 5 per cent bonds, but they will soon learn that as they pay no income tax it will be more profitable for them to convert their tax-exempt 5 per cent bonds into taxable 6 per cent bonds. Persons receiving larger incomes, to whom the tax-free privilege is worth 2 per cent or 3 per cent every year, can well afford to pay a premium for land-bank bonds. In the summer of 1918 land-bank bonds were resold in the New York market at 106 and even higher. Following the natural tendency to seek a financial level, these tax-exempt bonds will rapidly drift into the possession of persons and corporations receiving larger incomes, in whose possession they will cause the greatest loss to the National Treasury. Land-bank bonds are readily sold at a premium. A Chicago syndicate, on February 25, advertised $3,000,000 of joint-stock land-bank bonds at 102. Liberty bonds are now sold, less accrued interest, at nearly 10 points lower.

Before the value of tax exemption to the wealthy investor became generally known Federal land-bank bonds for several good reasons were slow of sale. In January, 1918, Congress, at the request of Secretary McAdoo and the Federal Farm Loan Board, appropriated $200,000,000, which the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to draw from the National Treasury to purchase land-bank bonds in order that Federal land banks might be enabled to continue in operation. At the close of 1918 the National Treasury had on hand about $67,000,000 of Federal land-bank bonds which had been thus purchased by funds from the National Treasury.

In May, 1918, a vigorous advertising campaign was put on in the newspapers for the sale of Federal land-bank 5 per cent tax-free bonds, and they were sold to the amount of about $55,000,000, coming in direct competition with liberty bonds. Owing to the depreciation of liberty bonds, the public sale of Federal land-bank bonds was discontinued for a few months during the last of 1918.

In January, 1919, the sale of Federal land-bank bonds "over the counter" at Federal land banks was resumed, and they are now so sold in competition with liberty bonds. They are not advertised in newspapers, but circulars offering them for sale are mailed to investors.

The sale of joint-stock land-bank bonds has been vigorously kept up by newspaper advertising and by personal solicitation, materially depressing the market for liberty bonds, which do not have the same freedom from taxation which the law gives to land-bank bonds.

Thousands of people of moderate means have been compelled to sell their liberty bonds at a sacrifice. It is estimated that in the market of New York City alone during the month of January an average of half a million dollars was lost every day by the sale of $10,000,000 of liberty bonds each day at an approximate price of 95.

The great demand for tax-exempt securities on the part of people who desire to evade war taxes has nearly doubled the number of joint-stock land banks since the 1st of December, and new ones will spring up every month. It has also greatly increased the demand for bonds of Federal land banks. The land banks are now working to capacity and unable to supply the call for tax-exempt securities. There are 12 Federal land banks. So great is the demand for the bonds that the president of one of them, which made $15,000,000 of loans in 1918, predicts that his bank will do a business of $50,000,000 this year.

There are over $4.000,000,000 of farm mortgages in the United States on which the income is subject to Federal income tax. They are also subject to State and local taxation.

The refunding of these mortgages by land banks will exempt them from all forms of taxes, Federal and local, affording a tax-free investment field for persons with large incomes. This will still further depreciate the price of liberty bonds now in existence and will make the sale of future issues more difficult. Another result will be to cause the withdrawal of taxable time deposits from banks and their investment in these tax-free land-bank bonds.

The approximate amount of $200,000,000 of land-bank bonds absorbed by the public and by the National Treasury is small as compared with the amount of liberty bonds in existence, and some authorities deny that this could affect the market.

It is well known that prices rise or fall in anticipation of competing conditions. The prices of wheat, cotton, and hogs are affected by the prospect for the crop of next year and by the probable amount of imports from competing countries. The same natural laws of supply and demand affect the market price of bonds as of agricultural products. The probable issue within a few years of several billion dollars of tax-free farm land-bank bonds affects the present market for liberty bonds just as the report that the embargo had been lifted from the importation of Argentine corn caused the market price in leading American markets to drop 7 cents in one day before a single bushel had been loaded for shipment from South America.

According to the latest printed reports of the Department of Internal Revenue, there are 6,633 revenue returns showing incomes in excess of $100,000, of which number 206 exceed a million dollars.

It is estimated that 21,375,000 families in this country receive incomes that do not exceed $2.000 per year and are not subject to income tax. Not one of these 21,375,000 families could receive the benefit of a penny from investment in bonds free from income taxes. Millions of them are patriotic investors in liberty bonds, and on them has come the bulk of the loss caused by sale of liberty bonds at a discount.

Every dollar of taxes evaded by wealthy owners of land-bank tax-free bonds is shifted to others who own taxable property and to consumers who are compelled to pay higher prices for the clothes they wear and for every article of merchandise they use because of the increased taxes levied on manufacturers and merchants. All are made to suffer that a very few may benefit.

To a person receiving an income of $1,000,000 the tax exemption of 77 per cent is worth 3.85 per cent per year on a 5 per cent land-bank bond. To a person receiving $100,000 per year the tax exemption of 66 per cent is worth 3.3 per cent per year on a 5 per cent land-bank bond. With the $4,000,000,000 of farm loans refunded in 5 per cent tax-exempted bonds, if held by bondholders having an average income of $100,000 per year, the national loss would be $132,000,000 every year.

Careful investigation shows that in localities where three-fourths of the land-bank loans are made the benefit to the borrower is less than half of 1 per cent. In Iowa, where loans are now being made by Federal land banks to the extent of a million and a half a month, the current commercial rate for over 25 years has been 5½ to 6 per cent. Federal land banks are loaning at 5½ per cent and joint-stock land banks are loaning at 6 per cent. In other sure-crop States, where over two-thirds of the food crops of this country are raised, conditions are the same. Less than one-sixth of the tax-exemption benefit goes to the borrower, while the deficit in the National Treasury must be made up by the taxpayers at large at a net loss to the Nation of over five-sixths.

A loan of $140,000 was recently made to one man on land in Barrington Township, Cook County, Ill., at 6 per cent by a joint-stock land bank. The rate is not lower than would have been made by any loan company, though private investors would probably have insisted on a more conservative loan. On this one loan the National Treasury would lose annually $4,620 if the bonds were held by a person receiving an income of $100,000.

The original purposes of the law are now defeated by the effects of increased income taxes and by the present methods of its administration. Instead of being a special aid to farmers of small means, it is largely used to finance well-to-do real estate owners who are not suitable subjects for charitable aid at Government expense. It also enables the wealthy to dodge tax burdens which then fall on the less fortunate.

To show the small benefit of these loans to the borrower and the great benefit to the bondholder, assume that Peter Smith, of Illinois, borrows $10,000. He gives a mortgage for $10,000. He receives $9,500 in cash and $500 in bank stock, on which he assumes a double liability, making his entire liability $10,500. He pays $550 a year interest, or 5½ per cent on $10,000. He only has the use of $9,500, but he hopes that when the loan is paid off in 34½ years that the settlement will show a profit on the bank stock. Smith could have borrowed that $10,000 at 6 per cent from a private investor and had the use of $10,000 by paying $600 a year without running any risk of loss or double liability on the $500 of bank stock. But if everything turns out all right and the bank pays dividends for 34½ years, Smith will save $50 the first year.

Now, take the other side of the case and see what the American taxpayers lose through the deficit in the National Treasury caused by the tax exemption of $10,000 of bonds that had to be sold to furnish the money for Smith. Over 200 individuals and corporations receiving incomes of more than a million dollars a year are subject to an income tax of 77 per cent on the excess above a million. On $10,000 of 5 per cent bonds the income is $500 a year. The income tax of 77 per cent on $500 is $385. This owner of the tax-exempt farm bonds makes $385 a year because he is not required to pay that amount into the National Treasury. To offset this loss to the National Treasury Peter Smith hopes to make $50. Here is a net loss of $335 a year that Smith's neighbors and other citizens of the country must pay to make up the deficit in the National Treasury caused by this tax exemption on the Smith bonds. It would save $335 to the taxpayers annually if the bondholders were required to pay legal taxes and Smith was given a donation of $50 from the National Treasury. The tax-exempt bonds may run for 20 years, and it will be more than 20 years before the war debts are paid.

Mr. Speaker, the unexpected effect of the law increasing taxes has been to automatically reverse the action of the tax-exemption section of the Federal farm-loan act. Instead of benefiting the poor farmer, it most benefits the very rich bondholder at a ratio of $385 to $50, more than 7 to 1.

The law now provides that loans may be made as small as $100 and as large as $10,000.

The last report of the Federal Farm Loan Board recommends amendments to eliminate all loans below $500 and to increase the limit to $25,000. In order to qualify under the law for a $25,000 loan a landowner must have property worth $50,000. During the past year the land banks have violated the plain intent of the law by permitting landowners to obtain loans larger than $10,000. This was admitted by Farm Loan Commissioner Norris before the House Committee on Banking and Currency very recently.

This has been done by resorting to the subterfuge of permitting the farm owner to temporarily transfer parts of his farm to his wife and other members of his family for borrowing purposes. By such connivance loans of $20,000 or more could readily be made. At the same time dozens of deserving applicants for small loans, whom the law was especially enacted to benefit, have been ignored and compelled to borrow elsewhere. I insist that this is an unwarranted misuse of the law, detrimental to the public good in this time of financial stress.

These large loans enable wealthy landowners to acquire the farms of their neighbors and make it more difficult for tenants to become farm owners. This special favoritism has a tendency to inflate prices and encourages speculation rather than farm settlement. When the bill was before the House in 1916 I contended that it would "not open a way for landless men without capital to become landowners." One of my opponents then used this language:

> It is not possible for one individual to borrow more than $10,000 * * * it is intended to help the farmer who is not well to do; it is intended to help the tenant farmer to get a home.

Mr. Speaker, I now assert without fear of contradiction that my position was correct. I refer to the monthly reports and to the annual report of the Federal Farm Loan Board to prove that the landless man is getting very little land.

To repeal the tax-exemption section of the Federal farm-loan act will not interfere with the purposes for which the law was enacted.

The continuance of this tax exemption of land-bank bonds will be in effect a special subsidy granted to a very few farmers at great expense to the Nation. During the first two years following the enactment of the law only one farmer in each hundred was favored, and only 1 family was benefited annually out of 604 families engaged in all occupations, while all were compelled to pay higher taxes and higher living expenses to help the few.

It would have been much cheaper to have given a direct bonus to all families benefited than to have favored them by the expensive method of granting them tax exemptions to bondholders.

When the bill was under consideration three years ago, I opposed the sections which have since virtually granted a subsidy to about 1 per cent of the farmers, less than 70,000, at the expense of 110,000,000 people. This subsidy in the form of tax exemption is most unjust and dangerous and many times more expensive to the Nation than the free use of $9,000,000 capital and the heavy overhead and general costs that the public pays.

Continuance of this tax exemption will soon make it necessary to create Government supervised banks, operated by salaried Government officials, to loan money on personal credit and to loan on village and city property, for the reason that other classes will demand the special privileges now granted to a small part of the farming class. All this will need to be done on tax-exempt bonds and mortgages, to the great loss of the majority of American citizens.

Hon. Louis F. Post, Assistant Secretary of Labor, recently stated with regard to the payment of wages:

> Business men and employers are overlooking the fact that the real employer of labor is the consumer—the laboring man himself. Every man who is put to work, whether it be building a house, constructing a road, or digging a ditch, is employing other men—men who sell him food and clothes—and these in turn employ others who manufacture the food and clothes.

I desire to add that the real taxpayer is the consumer. Everything he eats, wears, or uses is made higher priced by the increased taxes paid by merchants and manufacturers when they are compelled to carry the tax burdens evaded by owners of tax-free bonds. The man and woman who consume all of their incomes every year pay a heavier proportionate indirect consumption tax than those who have larger incomes and are thus enabled to save part.

The tax exemption of land-bank bonds is a dangerous entering wedge toward converting the banking business and other private enterprises and industries into Government monopolies inefficiently operated at the expense of the general taxpaying public, by Government employees whose principal interest is in the salaries they receive, and who can not be pecuniarily affected by the success or failure of the business which they are hired to supervise or conduct.

The country will never receive as good service from banks, grocery stores, shops, or shoe factories as at the present time if they are taken under Government management. Managers and employees directly interested in economical and efficient management give better service than those who depend on taxes instead of profits for salaries.

It will be an unlucky day for the American citizen when the clothes he wears are manufactured by the Government or when fire insurance becomes a Government monopoly, if the same high carnival of expense prevails as that which marked the output of Government-manufactured airplanes and warships.

The experiences of the past two years cause the taxpayer to shudder and his pocketbook to shrivel.

It is conceded by all economists that the evasion of taxes by one class of citizens causes heavier tax burdens to be imposed on other citizens. The Federal census of 1910 shows 6,361,502 farms in the United States. Mortgaged farms occupied by owners were 1,327,439. These are the only farms that can be legally mortgaged to the Federal land banks. Therefore if loans are made under this law to the fullest extent only one farm out of five would be benefited, and four farmers out of five would suffer that one might receive slight benefits from the tax exemption. The farmers who received the loans would find the benefits largely offset by the heavier direct and indirect taxes which they would be compelled to pay because of the bondholders' exemption from taxation. Wage earners and persons engaged in all other occupations receive no benefit and are required to pay higher taxes because bondholders are exempt.

The farmers of this country are sincere patriots. They do not ask to be aided by accepting a very small part of a tax-exemption bonus donated to tax-dodging millionaires. In this respect I know they are in accord with the utterance of President Wilson in his first annual message when he said:

> The farmers, of course, ask and should be given no special privilege, such as extending to them the credit of the Government itself. What they need and should obtain is legislation which will make their own abundant and substantial credit resources available as a foundation for joint concerted local action in their own behalf in getting the capital they must use.

I voted for this bill in the vain hope that the law would benefit the small farmer and aid the man of moderate means to buy a farm of his own.

I then feared and predicted that the law would be used to finance wealthy landowners and large real estate operations. I did not expect to see the struggling applicant for a $100 or $300 or $400 loan neglected in order that the proceeds of liberty bonds could be loaned to the rich farmer, who, by putting part of his property in his wife's name, might borrow $20,000, while many deserving applicants for small loans of $500 each might wait in vain for help. It is no secret that large loans are more profitable for the Federal land banks, and therefore the tendency is to give the cold shoulder to the small borrower.

Mr. Speaker, I am discussing this subject as a business man. It is not a political question. The largest percentage of big loans in excess of the legal limit of $10,000 will be found in northern Republican States, like Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota. The greatest number of complaints because of neglect of the small borrower come from southern Democratic States. My objections to this law are nonpartisan. Tax exemption is economically wrong, scientifically wrong.

When the law was enacted in 1916 no one could foresee the war and its burden of debt and heavy taxes. Had the present income-tax law been in effect in 1916 the tax-exemption section of the Federal farm-loan act would never have passed Congress. When I voted for this law I did not expect to see the time come when it could be used to enable rich individuals and great corporations to evade war taxes by converting taxable assets into Federal land-bank tax-free bonds.

The tax exemption of future issues of Federal land-bank bonds and joint-stock land-bank bonds should be stopped, because it—

Impairs the national credit and depreciates liberty bonds.

Enables wealthy individuals and corporations to evade war taxes.

Causes a direct and increasing loss to the National Treasury.

Increases the taxes on persons and property that can not escape taxation.

Causes heavy losses to over 20,000,000 patriotic investors in liberty bonds.

Increases the cost of living to all consumers.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I desire to repeat that all of the original purposes for which the law was enacted can be promoted if the tax amendments I favor are adopted.

HON. CHAS. POPE CALDWELL,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, January 10, 1919.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, the improvement of Newtown Creek is between the second and third congressional districts of New York. I represent the second district and am very familiar with the situation. This improvement is for the purpose of taking care of the commerce that is now actually knocking at the door. This river is only 4 miles long, and yet it carries for its length more commerce than any other river in the world. The commerce that is coming there is of almost every kind and character. The river is full all the time, and it is necessary to take care of the increased business that the building up of that community is demanding. Every week since September, 1913, a new factory has been erected within 2 miles of this river. To-day the second congressional district has more factories than any State in the Union except six, and there is more commerce on the waters in this little 4-mile stream than in the great city of Philadelphia. So much for the local improvement.

But there is something else in this. It seems to me that we ought now at this time to consider the condition of our country.

I want to call attention to the fact that on the 11th of November, 1918, the world had something like 6,450,000 dead-weight tons less of shipping than she had on the 1st of August, 1914; that prior to the 1st of August, 1914, the average production of tonnage in the world was approximately 3,600,000 tons a year, so that to-day we are approximately 20,850,000 dead-weight tons behind what we would have had without the war.

In addition to that, if we undertook immediately, with the present world capacity, to supply that deficiency, it would take us about four years to complete the job, so that 35,000,000 dead-weight tons of ships must be built to make us whole within a very short time.

It also happens that America to-day is perhaps better equipped than all the rest of the world to supply that deficiency in tonnage, and I have no doubt, from the attitude taken by the administration, that an effort is going to be made to have America assume her share of the burden of doing that. You can see how important the development is when you realize that America is going to do her share, and that we will probably make, in addition to the nine or ten million dead-weight tons we now have, something over 20,000,000 dead-weight tons. If we create half of the new tonnage we are going to have a merchant marine of which our country may be proud, and it is going to be put to work if we have facilities to enable it to dock in our country.

I hope you will pardon me for making these observations, because I live in an industrial and commercial center, and these matters are very much alive with us, and I have given them some study. The war has resulted in the loss of many million workingmen from Russia. It has resulted in the loss of commercial enterprise, and it has left over 200,000,000 people depending on the rest of the world for business enterprise. Half of Germany's manhood has been wiped out, or crippled or maimed, between the ages of 16 years and 50; its ocean-going ships have been confiscated and its industries ruined. England has lost millions of maimed, crippled, and dead, and France has suffered likewise. Italy has also lost an enormous man power, while we in America occupy a unique position, having fought a war and come out at the end with approximately as many men as we would have had if we had not gone in the war, because the sanitary conditions in our camps have resulted in a lower death rate among the men than would have occurred if they had not been in the Army.

Our business has been kept up because the allies have purchased a portion of their munitions and supplies here. Our factories have been greatly enlarged and have been running at full speed, and our business men have been wise enough to look forward to the day after the war. They have taken war business, looking forward to the time when we would come into peace, and an opportunity would be afforded to reap the great reward that has come to us because of the humanitarian war that we have carried on.

Now, then, the world's shipping, the world's business, is largely going to be done here, because we have the factories, we have the man power, and it is going to be done here because a great part of the world's shipping is going to be of American registry, and it is for this Congress at this time to look at this thing in a big, broad way, and make harbors here to take care of the world's commerce we are going to draw during the years that follow peace.

I point this out to you to show you the interest I have in the matter, because I represent a portion of the New York Harbor district. New York Harbor is fast becoming congested, and something must be done at once. We have pending now projects for the Jamaica Bay development, the Flushing Bay development, and all of the waters around New York Harbor, as mentioned to you by Dock Commissioner Hulbert, who was recently a Member of this House, which have not been adopted.

I only urge upon you the necessity at this time of adopting a broad policy to start out to spend the money that the President in his message here a few days ago said we ought to spend, so as to keep our people working, so that the transition period will not be one of stagnation, but one of development, and the spending of this money in the development of our harbors is laying up treasure for the time to come.

I am particularly interested in the development of Newtown Creek. There has been a recommendation for the carrying forward of that river, with an expenditure of $510,000. I introduced a bill at the last session of Congress, and the War Department has recommended it. The enormous tonnage carried by this little river makes it imperative that such improvement be made to relieve congestion and permit proper commercial development of adjacent municipalities.

OF
HON. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, March 3, 1919.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I obtained permission to print some remarks in the RECORD about cotton for the purpose of discussing some features of the cotton question in addition to those that I have presented to the House in the speeches that I have made during the last session of Congress.

I want to bring to the attention of the country the fact that it cost more to produce the cotton crop of 1918 than any crop ever produced in the United States. Thousands of boys who helped to produce the crop of 1917 had been called to the colors, and this fact alone presented a very serious labor situation in the cotton-growing States. In addition to that, the price paid for labor at camps and cantonments, at munitions plants and industrial centers where guns and war supplies of every kind were being made, took thousands of white and negro laborers from the cotton belt, and in the spring of 1918 the cotton farmer found himself face to face with a very embarrassing labor situation. He could not obtain the labor he desired and needed, and that which he did procure cost him four times as much as the same character of labor had cost him in any previous year. Fertilizers cost from four to eight times as much as formerly, and agricultural implements four times as much, while plow mules, for which he paid $100 a few years ago, cost him from $250 to $300 in 1918. Another big item of expense in the production of the cotton crop of 1918 was caused by the boll weevil.

I have made diligent and wide inquiry in all the cotton-growing States as to the cost of producing the 1918 cotton crop, and every answer that I have received places the cost of production above 24 cents a pound, the figures going as high as 28 cents. Now, let us see what the farmer making five bales of cotton—and this is above the average yield—has expended in producing it at 24 cents a pound. The five bales have cost him $600. If he sells this cotton at 23 cents a pound, he will receive $575 for the five bales, $25 less than it cost to produce them. His year's work is gone, and not a cent of profit has he made, but he has lost $25 in the transaction that it took him 12 months to complete. If he should sell it for 30 cents a pound, he would have a profit of only $150 on his entire cotton crop to show for his time, his investment, and his labors for a whole year. I mention this situation in order that those who do not live in the cotton-growing States may know and understand why the farmers, merchants, and bankers throughout the cotton belt are standing together in a strong cotton-holding movement and refusing to sell for less than 30 cents a pound.

This concerted action on the part of the farmers, merchants, and bankers of the cotton belt is for the purpose of preventing tremendous losses on the remainder of the cotton crop of 1918 and to secure for the cotton producers of the United States a price that will cover the cost of production plus a fair and reasonable profit. From farmer to merchant and from merchant to banker every investment made and every business calculation indulged in with regard to the production of cotton figured that the minimum price would be not less than 30 cents a pound. Labor was employed, implements and live stock purchased, general supplies furnished, and money advanced, all with the conviction that cotton would sell for 30 cents or more. The cotton spinners of the United States expected to pay more than 30 cents. They did pay more than that for hundreds of thousands of bales of the 1918 crop. In contracting for the sale of goods to be made of cotton produced in 1918 they figured that the cost of the cotton to be used in their mills would be from 35 to 40 cents a pound.

Farmer, merchant, and banker in the cotton-growing States all knew that cotton would have to sell for more than 30 cents in order to yield the producer a profit and enable him to meet his obligations to the merchant and banker who had cooperated with him in the making of the crop. The cotton spinner was acquainted with this situation and made his arrangements to pay from 35 to 40 cents a pound for cotton, and he did pay 35 cents for some of his supply.

Remember that these cotton prices obtained when the war was raging and uncertainty and danger followed every bale exported from the United States. But when the war had ended and cotton could move freely, so far as submarine danger was concerned, we saw the spinning interests of the Old World enter into a bear conspiracy to beat down the price of American cotton, and they commenced to operate upon the cotton exchanges, and they joined forces with certain spinning interests over here and sold the market short—that is, these spinners who had no cotton to sell sold the word "cotton" in lots of thousands of bales, and kept selling until they had beaten down the exchange quotation and cotton futures went down $75 a bale.

This occurred in the face of the fact that the cotton crop of the United States was about 6,000,000 bales short of the world's demand. This bear conspiracy paid no attention to the facts of the actual supply of cotton or to the consumptive demand for American cotton. It ignored the law of supply and demand, and sought through a cotton-gambling deal to hammer down the price, stampede the American producer, and frighten him into selling at the low price that they were pleased to pay.

Then, in order to prevent the loss of hundreds of millions of dollars on the cotton crop of 1918, our farmers, merchants, and bankers were compelled to unite their forces in a strong cotton-holding movement. They were driven to this course by the inexcusable and indefensible conduct of a band of foreign and certain domestic spinners, who set themselves to the task of gambling down cotton values, so that they could reap tremendous profits. They cared nothing for the producers' right to demand a living profit or for the financial losses and business disaster that would surely come to the cotton producers of the United States if the bear conspiracy had succeeded in forcing them to sell cotton below the cost of production.

These financial losses and this business disaster would have fallen not only upon the cotton producers but also upon the merchant and banker in the cotton-growing States. The producer and merchant who had cotton could not afford to sell at the low price arbitrarily fixed through a gambling deal on the cotton exchange, and they had to borrow money to enable them to hold their cotton. The banks came to their rescue and lent them money on the cotton that they held. So the producer, the merchant, and the banker were all in the same boat, and the unity of purpose and concerted action they have shown in their determination to hold the remainder of this cotton crop until the price will yield a profit is commendable and praiseworthy from every honest viewpoint. I commend them for the stand they have taken; I praise them for the business acumen, intelligence, and foresight displayed in this cooperative movement to enforce our just demand for a cotton price that will yield a fair profit. But for this united stand cotton would not—it could not—have been held. If it had not been held foreign merchants and spinners would have purchased it at a low price, a price that would not have covered the cost of production, the cotton producers of the United States would have suffered heavy financial losses, and business would have been injured in other sections of the country.

The East, the North, and the West would all have felt the evil effects of the low prices paid for this great American product. When cotton fares well in the markets of the world and our producers receive a good price, they are able and willing to pay good prices for all that they buy from the merchants and manufacturers of the East and North and for the meat and grain and hay and live stock that they buy from the people of the West. So it is clearly seen that if a combination of foreign cotton merchants and spinners, aided by certain spinners over here, is permitted to beat down the price of American cotton and buy it at a low price they not only hurt the business of and greatly injure the cotton producers of the United States, but hurt also every man with whom the cotton producer has business, every man from whom he buys supplies of any kind. When the cotton producer of the United States prospers, his prosperity is shared by the people of every section of the country. The more money we have with which to buy, the better prices we are able to pay for what the merchants and manufacturers of other sections have to sell. The cotton-growing States are good customers of the East, the North, and the West, and when anything happens to cut down our purchasing power it injuriously affects those from whom we buy in the other three great sections of our country.

The prosperity of the cotton industry of the United States not only contributes to the financial wealth of every other section but serves the Nation as no other agricultural product does or can; it brings to our country the balance of trade, and brings gold when all other products fail. God has given to the United States a monopoly in the production of white, short-staple cotton; it can not be produced anywhere else in the world. We produce in normal times about two-thirds of the world's supply of cotton. Why should we permit a combination of foreign interests to come over here and beat down the price of American cotton and injure everybody who has to do with the production and sale of cotton in the United States? The effort by foreign spinners to "bear" the market and their persistence in selling short on the exchange to beat down the price have thoroughly aroused the people of the cotton-growing States, and I have never seen such intelligent cooperation and firm determination to hold cotton for a price that will yield a profit.

We are not only going to hold the cotton we now have until it will yield a profit, but we are going to greatly reduce the cotton acreage this year. It will not be hard to get the producers to cut down their cotton acreage. They have learned, and all of them now well know, that they can get more money for a small than for a large crop.

The winter of 1917 was very cold in the cotton-growing States, and the boll weevil was not so harmful to the crop of 1918 as it would have been following a mild winter; yet while planting a large acreage and trying to produce a big crop, we failed, and produced one of the smallest crops in years. Now, we have had a very mild winter, and every farmer in the boll-weevil-infected area knows that it is going to be very difficult to produce cotton there this year, and he is not going to plant much cotton; he is going to plant other things.

The New York Commercial a day or two ago said that a few years ago the cotton farmers agreed to reduce their acreage, but went home and planted far more cotton than ever, and made a big crop, and received a low price. Well, these farmers have learned by experience from the prices received for the last three crops—small, all of them—that they can get more money for a small crop than for a large one, and they have also learned that by raising foodstuffs and making the farm self-sustaining that they can keep their cotton off the market until the price will yield a profit. Let me say to the New York Commercial, and to all concerned, that the cotton producers of the United States and the financial interests back of them are wiser to-day than when they produced the big crop and received the low price. They know and understand the whole cotton business now better than at any other time in the history of the industry. Go into the cotton-growing States to-day, and behold the teamwork between farmer, merchant, and banker in holding cotton, and you will understand what I mean. Bear speculators and spinners said last fall that we would not hold cotton in any considerable quantity for any length of time, but we did, and are still holding it. These same bear interests are now saying that we will not reduce the cotton acreage this year, but we will.

There are several reasons why the acreage will be greatly reduced. First, it is to the interest of the producer to reduce it. As I have already said, he has learned by experience that he can get more money for a small crop than for a large one, also that it requires less labor and expense to produce a small crop. Every farmer in the cotton belt knows this and knows it well. So when he is urged to cut down his acreage this spring and is told that by doing so he will receive more money for the cotton he does produce, he will know that that statement is true.

An 8,000,000-bale crop in 1919 would in all probability sell for 60 cents a pound, or $2,400,000,000, while if a 12,000,000-bale crop should be made and should sell for 30 cents a pound, it would bring only $1,800,000,000, which is $600,000,000 less than the producer would receive for the small crop of 8,000,000 bales. Does anyone think that the producer would rather have $1,800,000,000 than $2,400,000,000, or that he would deliberately put forth the additional labor and expense required to make the 12,000,000 bales when by doing so he would lose both time and money?

Another reason that the cotton acreage will be reduced is that the merchants and bankers who furnish supplies and money to two-thirds of the cotton producers are demanding that the acreage be reduced before they will advance supplies and money with which to make the crop.

The holding of cotton and the reduction of acreage have been made necessary by a combination of foreign cotton merchants and spinners, aided by certain spinners and speculators in the United States. If cotton prices had remained where the law of supply and demand placed them there would have been no holding of cotton and no reduction of acreage. There is not enough cotton in the United States now to supply the American mills and the spindles of Great Britain, Canada, Spain, and Japan, yet we have seen a combination of foreign and domestic spinners, ignoring the law of supply and demand, selling the futures market short and using every means at their command to beat down the price so they can buy up the American supply of cotton and then boost the price after cotton has gone from the hands of the American producers.

In an honest futures market, free from manipulation, the price is always above that of spot cotton; yet we have seen the futures market in the United States frequently in the last few weeks driven down by the short selling of fictitious stuff called cotton until the future price was $35 a bale below the price of spot cotton in the markets of the country. Any man who knows anything at all about cotton knows that only wild speculation and, worse than that, rank gambling could produce such a ridiculous situation.

Now, then, when the American cotton producer knew that the bulk of the cotton supply of the world was in his hands and that the world needed several million bales more than he could supply, and when he also knew that a combination of foreign and domestic spinners were ignoring the law of supply and demand and arbitrarily driving down the price to force him to sell for the price that they had agreed among themselves to pay, a price below the cost of production, a price that meant great financial loss to him, what was he, as an intelligent American citizen, to do but hold his cotton and refuse to sell?

For three and a half months the conduct of the exchanges has been most reprehensible. While the war raged and the sea swarmed with submarines and cotton ships were difficult to obtain and ocean freight rates were very high and every bale exported ran the risk of being destroyed, the exchanges quoted cotton at from 32 to 35 cents a pound. Then, under far more favorable conditions, when the war had ended and submarines were gone from the sea and ships had been procured to carry cotton to the allied and neutral nations and ocean freight rates were reduced $17.50 on the bale and when Germany and Austria had made known their desire to obtain 2,000,000 bales of American cotton, the cotton exchanges of the United States suddenly failed and refused to represent and reflect the price justified by these more favorable conditions; but, on the contrary, they immediately became the handy instrument of foreign combinations of cotton merchants and spinners to beat down the price of American cotton.

If the cotton producers of the United States had sold their cotton at the prices manufactured on the cotton exchanges, nothing short of bank failures, bankruptcy, and dire financial distress in all of the cotton-growing States would have resulted. The cotton exchange should, and the honest exchange will, reflect the price warranted by the law of supply and demand; but when the exchange can be manipulated so as to ignore and nullify the law of supply and demand it ceases to serve any legitimate purpose and should be abolished. Let the exchanges observe the rule here announced or prepare to go out of business.

Four months have come and gone since the war ended, and grain and meat produced in the United States are now going into Germany, and the cotton producer of the United States can not quite understand why he is not permitted to sell cotton to Germany. The cotton merchants and spinners of Germany desire to buy and store in the United States 1,000,000 bales of American cotton, to be shipped when peace terms are agreed upon. I for one believe that they should be permitted to do so. There is nothing unfair or unreasonable in this plan, and I am confident that the necessary arrangements will be made to permit this sale of American cotton.

If it is the purpose to keep cotton from going to Germany and Austria for the present, and if, while doing that, we can permit the cotton agents of those countries to buy cotton from our producers and store it in the United States until peace terms are agreed upon, why is not this a fulfillment of our obligations to our allies in this regard? Germany and Austria want 2,000,000 bales of American cotton. If the other cotton merchants and spinners of the Old World do not want Germany and Austria to have any of the American cotton supply, let them come forward and buy the cotton now being held by the American producers, paying for it a price that will yield a profit. If the embargo on American cotton to Germany is used to depress the price here and work injury to the cotton producers of the United States, why should we permit cotton merchants and spinners, even among our allies, to take advantage of this situation and use it to help them beat down the price of American cotton? Why should we be called upon to say that we will not only not permit cotton to go to Germany but we will not even let Germany buy cotton and store it in the United States? Why should the American cotton producers be left to the mercy of a combination of foreign "bear" interests who are trying to buy our cotton at a low price so that they themselves may sell it to Germany and Austria a little later on at a tremendous profit?

If we, in time of peace, permit cotton merchants and spinners among our allies to employ emergency war measures to depress the price of American cotton in the markets of the United States, in order that they may buy it at a low price, are we serving the cotton farmers of the United States or are we turning them over to be pillaged and plundered by the cotton interests of foreign countries?

Our first duty in this business matter is to the cotton producers of the United States. And I am glad to say that those in authority with whom I have talked about this matter are favorable to the plan of allowing Germany to buy cotton and store it here until peace terms are agreed upon, and this will be done. Let me say in conclusion that the experience of the last four months with cotton has taught our farmers, merchants, and bankers in the cotton-growing States a very important lesson. They have learned that they must rely upon themselves to protect and safeguard cotton in the selling season. They have learned that by concerted action they can prevent the forced sale of cotton at destructive prices. Every man who speaks in the cotton belt this spring should urge the reduction of cotton acreage and insist that every farmer should produce his own food supplies and be so fortified this fall with other farm products that he can hold his cotton, if necessary, and refuse to sell until the price is satisfactory. Let our merchants and bankers begin now to prepare to do whatever is necessary this fall to back the cotton producer in his demand for a fair price and a living profit.
